Strossen continued by saying that "members of Congress respond to pressure. I believe from my experience the e– mail, faxes, letters and phone calls will affect them."

Theresa Conley, a senior STPEC and history major, remained with four other individuals to discuss Strossen's lecture in the Campus Center. "The only criticism I have is I don't understand her stance on porn. I feel she does not give credit to the power of image."

"While it was valuable, the law cannot address cyberspace," said Dave Jolly, a senior philosophy major. "It's an impossible thing."

Personal discovery through mask making

By Jess Arsenault and Dana Quagliariello
Collegian Correspondents

On Saturday, Oct 26, the Women of Color Program presented a workshop entitled "What Mask Are You Wearing?" The workshop was facilitated by Rose Sackey–Milligan, an employee of the public foundation, the Peace Development Fund.

In the course of the six hours in which the workshop was held, Sackey–Milligan taught approximately 15 women how to make masks, and learn more about themselves and each other.

During the introduction, the women were encouraged to speak about their own lives: past, present and future. Their significant experiences were counted as guides to create a "vision" for their future, said Sackey–Milligan.

When asked what the workshop meant to Everywomen's Center intern Makgathi Mokwena, a native of South Africa, she stated that "it means connecting with other women in the area," since "it is very difficult to get a sense of community around here and working with each other forms a strong union."

After opening up to each other, the women began to create masks of their own faces out of a paper–mache type substance. Each women executed the creation of their mask with the help of a partner so they could, "create a partnership building community among women," said Sackey–Milligan.

These exercises had the intention of eliminating the natural tendency for women's feelings of competition and isolation.

After lunch, the women rejoined the group. Each woman analyzed her ideas about the purpose of the masks, and took part in creating human sculptures.

Next, the women decorated their masks, and gathered to share what the process of making the masks meant to them. The workshop worked to bring the women together and strengthen their own stories as women and individuals.

Rose Sackey–Milligan also characterized the experience as "self–reflective and emotional," as well as stating that the forum was one of confidentiality and was providing a safe environment for women. She also said that questions revolved around the theme of "the Game of Life."

Senior STPEC major Deepa Sritharan commented that this workshop was "a place for women of color to come together to become one with each other and acknowledge one another's needs together," to become powerful.

Sritharan also voiced her concern that men on the campus seemed to be more unified, and that programs on campus do not seem to target women of color very often.

Rose Sackey–Milligan also plans to teach other interested individuals how to facilitate mask–making workshops in the spring, including workshops for all women. Mokwena plans to hold a program celebrating the communion of women, in which relationships between mothers, daughters, sisters and friends are honored through storytelling, song and African dance.

IMAGINE

a world where every person has equal access to information ... where no geographic, cultural, or status barrier stands in the way of communication.

At 3Com we imagine such a world...And to make this image a reality we conceived Horizon 2000, our vision and strategy for building a new kind of company. Together with our advanced technology and high performance products we will unleash the power of access to information everywhere, at anytime, for everyone.

3Com is attending the Undergraduate Business Club and the School of Management Career Fair on Thursday, October 31st, from 1pm-5pm, in the Campus Center Auditorium. Please stop by our booth to learn about career opportunities at 3Com. Positions are available at our Boxborough, Southborough, and Marlborough locations.

We are particularly interested in meeting with School of Management students who wish to explore careers in:

INSIDE SALES AND BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT

Other opportunities available for:

SOFTWARE DEVELOPMENT ENGINEERS
TECHNICAL SUPPORT ENGINEERS
MANUFACTURING SYSTEMS ENGINEERS

Imagine yourself working in a challenging environment, making a competitive salary, with a full benefits package, plus 28 paid days off per year, Profit Sharing, Stock Options, Stock Purchase Plan, Sabbatical Program and 401(k)Plan.

If you can imagine yourself in this position after graduation, you belong at 3Com.

If you are unable to see us at the Campus Center Auditorium on October 31st, please send/email your resume and cover letter indicating your career objectives to:

A cheap buzz: culture

Are you cultured? The dictionary defines culture as refinement of intellectual and artistic taste, something there seems to be a shortage of at this University, at least in the student body. Assuming that there is a shortage of this "culture" stuff here, we have to start wondering if that is a bad thing and whether or not it's worth fighting for.

Before you start jumping, I will acknowledge that UMass has it's own subculture, but that subculture seems to have little to do with art and intellectualism. It has more to do with beer, basketball, pizza, parties, drugs and yelling people. Defend it as you may, little of the culture experienced on a typical UMass weekend will have any practical use in the real world.

Mark McGrath

If you're applying for a nice job and the interviewer asks you what you did for four years, saying that you spent every Friday or Saturday night in a stinky, smelly meat market of a frat house chasing "chicks" (or "guys" if that applies) is going to be of little use to you. They want to see more.

They want to see that you've actually done something to make yourself think. That you spent time experiencing sights and sounds (not substances) that were previously unknown to you. They want to see that you've attempted to refine your intellect and artistic tastes. They want to see culture.

When I say culture, I am in no way implying intellectual snobbery; that won't get you much farther than your record keg stand. Culture is the ability to carry on a discussion about a particular piece or style of music or art. Culture is seeing a statue not as an obstacle, but as a creation.

There are plenty of beautiful things which could contribute to the development of culture in this world and on this campus, but they seem to be overshadowed by the aspects of the more popular UMass culture. Taking the time to appreciate the finer aspects of life perpetually takes a back seat to BruiserBall even though, compared to athletes, musicians and artists spend as much, if not more, time practicing and honing their skills, which invariably requires more talent than dribbling a basketball.

While UMass is and will continue to be known mainly for its basketball program, we by no means have to restrict ourselves to only noticing that which goes through a hoop.

There's so much more out there.

One of the best aspects of this University is the Fine Arts Center. While many students on this campus may see it as the big cement thing overlooking the pond, those who have witnessed events there will tell you that it has much to offer. Having been there for three different events in the past week, I can testify that each performance has enhanced my view of the world, the University and the students who come here.

Spectators at the Multiband Pops concert at the FAC a week ago had the unique opportunity of sampling several different types of music and musical groups over the course of an evening, each group adding individual elements which served to enhance the experience as a whole. In one night, students could be acquainted with jazz, percussion, a capella and even dance groups, and those are just to name a few. Within the following week, world-renowned jazz queen Cleo Lane and tap legend Jimmy Slyde along with the group Stomp had all made their way across the Concert Hall Stage. If that lineup isn't impressive, I don't know what is.

And these events are affordable too. For the most part, student tickets won't cost more than $5 (that's $10 if you bring a date). After leaving the University, you may never have the chance to take in comparable events for such competitive prices.

The quality and variety of events featured at the FAC prove that there is more to the "scene" out here than beer and basketball. But to try and bring that message home to another student body that is largely and happily ignorant is a difficult chore.

It's possible students are intimidated by the arts, that they feel their lack of an understanding is a suitable excuse for a lack of involvement, but they're the ones who are going to have to suffer through years of unfamiliarity whenever a conversation veers away from sports and/or the weather.

As someone who came to the University particularly uncultured, and who for the most part has remained that way, I can assure you that going to a FAC performance isn't as scary as it seems. If you sit back and take it all in, you might actually think or feel something that you haven't experienced before. You might even want to talk about it. It's like a buzz, a cheap buzz that doesn't really die. It's also known as a little bit of culture.

Letters to the Editor

Keeping an eye on the Campus Store

To the editor:

Friday, Oct. 4 around 4 p.m., I went to the University Store to buy Gas-X for my stomach pain. After I paid for the Gas-X, I remembered that I needed a toothbrush. I went back to the store but while I was looking for a toothbrush I opened my package of Gas-X and took two tablets. Finding the toothbrush that I wanted, I went to the cashier to pay for it.

On my way out, I was stopped by two security persons. I was asked to follow them, which I did. I was taken to a little room in the back of the store. Then one of them presented to me a piece of plastified paper and asked me to read it. The paper stated: "You have the right to remain silent, anything you say can be used against you in a court of law." At that time, I asked the two security persons to tell me what I had been accused of. They told me that they saw me get two tablets from the package, put them in my mouth and put the package back on the shelf. I asked them to prove to me the existence of that package they claimed I opened. One of them went to find it.

Meanwhile, the other security person showed me a box of unwrapped items telling me that I was one of the persons that usually come to the store to do such things. The one that went to find the package came back to the room to say that he could not find the package. I asked him to check with the cashier to know whether or not I paid. He went on to check with the cashier whom acknowledged that I indeed paid for my Gas-X. At that time, I pulled out my package from my backpack and showed it to them.

I then exploded letting them know who I was and gave them a copy of an engineering newsletter that talked about me. The supervisor of the store came in to calm me down. I asked what would have happened if the cashier had denied that I paid. He told me that they would have accused me of stealing. He went on to tell me that they do make mistakes sometimes and he was sorry for what happened. Neither one of the security persons ever apologized to me at any time. I felt humiliated, angry and frustrated being the only black person surrounded by at least eight white people and being falsely accused of stealing. Never in my life have I been humiliated and degraded that way.

I left, but in less than 20 minutes, I went back to the store to collect my receipt from the garbage can. I also gave my name, social security number and address on campus so they could send me a letter of apology. Later in the afternoon, I told a friend of mine about the incident. He told me that I was not the only one and that any minority who walks in the store gets followed.

Out of curiosity, on Saturday, Oct. 5 around 1 p.m., I went back to the University Store. At that time, there were about 30 people purchasing in the store. In less than two minutes, I realized that I was followed by two students: a white female with a backpack and a white male wearing jeans and t-shirt. At one point, I was only a foot away from them when they came across each other. I seized the opportunity to ask them for their names. The male student left to write his name down.

Meanwhile the female student wrote her name for me on a piece of paper that I provided. After checking with his supervisor, the male student came back to tell me that it was not okay to give his name to me and was pressuring me to give the female student her name back. I refused. He then asked me for my name. I was going to write my name down for him, when he claimed that I was harassing. At that point I paid for another Gas-X that I had in hand and left the store.

Continuing my investigation Monday morning, Oct. 7 around 10 a.m., I went back to the University Store. I wore a different jacket. I did not wear the red hat that I usually wear so that I would not be noticed when I walked in. Once again, I noticed that I was followed by a white male wearing glasses, a blue rain-jacket and a backpack. Another white male student coming to check on me realized who I was because he was the student who claimed that I harassed him on Saturday. He then turned around to warn his colleague about me. Once again, I made it clear to both of them that I noticed that I was being followed.

At that point I realized what happened Friday was not an isolated incident. Therefore, a simple letter of apology from whoever it might be will be meaningless. I have been here for eight semesters but never realized that I have been followed by at least two security persons whenever I walked in the University Store. I asked the store supervisor to give me a copy of the incident report happening on Friday. I was frustrated in being a target whenever I walked to the University Store. I wanted the employees to know how I felt. They asked me to calm down while they called the police. Upon receiving my receipt, I left the store.

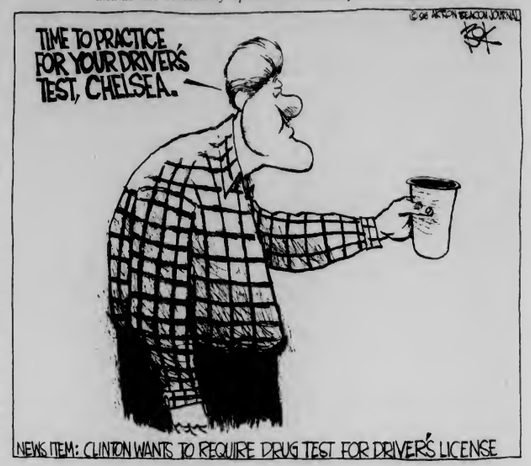
What peace?

To the editor:

I am writing to applaud Guy Ben-Tovim for finally clearing up the air about he recent incidents of violence in Israel (letters to the editor, October 23). Thanks to Ben- Tovim, who obviously knows a lot, including the thoughts and intentions of both the Israelis and the Palestinians, we now know that (a) Arafat and his people have been looking for an excuse to start a new Intefada since the peace accords, (b) the opening of the tunnel was in no way intended to desecrate the Palestinian holy sites, (c) that the tunnel was opened to bring tourists to the area and thus bring prosperity to both sides (silly of the Palestinians not to recognize this obvious fact), and (d) every citizen of Israel (including Netanyahu, I presume) has a strong desire for peace in the region.

All the governments and people of the world who criticized Netanyahu and his cohorts for needlessly provoking the confrontation can now heave a sigh of relief and withdraw their objections to the opening of the tunnel and shower the Israeli government with unqualified praise for the effort at bringing prosperity to the Palestinians. The Palestinians themselves should show their gratitude to the Israeli government for trying to improve their lot. So what if the Palestinians have a per capita income of less than $1,800 (down from $2,800 at the time of the first Oslo accord) while the Israelis have a per capita income of $15,000 (up from $13,800 during the first Oslo accord)? So what if the number of Palestinians working in Israel has dropped from 116,000 in 1992 to less than 18,000 today? And so what if the Palestinian unemployment rate is around 60 percent? After all, this is happening in the name of peace.



If only the ignorant Palestinians would recognize the value of the Israeli government's efforts and the peaceful intentions of every citizen of Israel, actions such as the opening of the tunnel that runs along the Al-Aqsa mosque would bring them prosperity.

Avraham Stern, a mentor of Israeli Prime Minister Yizhak Shamir, once referred to the Arabs as "beasts of the desert, not a legitimate people." Now the beasts are loose again. Fighting to protect their land and their legacy. How dare they? Ben-Tovim asks for peace. but on whose terms? At what cost for the people of Palestine?

Racial scapegoats

Sam McAfee

The Collegian tends to be an ideological battleground for the Israel-Palestine conflict. No other topic seems to get as much attention as this issue, so one would think that it would be fully explored. Rather, the parameters of debate on the issue have been limited to a historical, nationalist diatribe, replete with regular accusations of anti-Semitism in a McCarthyistic spirit.

The constant, and often unwarranted, slinging of the term anti-Semitism disturbs this columnist of Jewish decent, for it serves to dilute its meaning, rendering real acts of racism as commonplace and therefore acceptable. Unfortunately, those who disagree with the policies of the Israeli government are often branded with the term, though objection to state actions is perfectly within the bounds of democracy. One is not a traitor to America because they could not support the bombing of Cambodia, any more than one is anti-Semitic for critiquing the apartheid like conditions contained in the Oslo II "peace process."

The agreement leaves Israel in legal or effective control of most of the occupied territories, establishes the legitimacy of settlements taken by brute force and disregarded by most of the world, and relegates the Palestinian population to the overcrowded, ghettos of whatever desert wasteland is left over. They will continue to work the lower ranks of the economy for the benefit of Israeli citizens while not seeing any of the fruits of their never-ending toil.

I am not asserting that all Jews are racists because of the on-going exploitation of Palestinians. What is happening is that powerful elite interests in Israel, who are benefitting from this repression, have used the guise of nationalism and patriotism to rally working class Israelis behind them. Their hegemonic grip, protected by the United States, is ironically similar to tactics of ideological control employed by the German propagandists over 50 years ago. The same is currently employed by the American state-media-corporate structure that convinces us that people we suppressed for 500 years are to blame for our problems.

The United States does not support Israel because of a pro-Judaic stance. Our government knew about the German camps for a long time and only engaged the war because of provocation. After the war, the United States adopted SS officers protecting them from war-crimes investigations and using their techniques of repression throughout Latin America to fight communism, sometimes even hiring them for posts in Chile, Argentina and Guatemala. The U.S. government was not taking a stand on genocide (of which it itself is guilty) in World War II, but rather protecting the military and economic stability of our own racist and exploitative empire.

Here in the United States middle class whites seem to think that a group of people torn from their homeland, enslaved for 200 years, impoverished and suspended from political representation for another 100, and systematically contained within poverty stricken urban sectors and crushing police repression, can somehow just get up and shake hands with the colonizer like everything is just fine.

It is in the interest of middle class whites in dealing with racism, to construct a story that makes them out to be the kind and understanding savior of the black community, and erasing the horrid and incriminating past of racial hatred that whites are responsible for, have benefitted from and absolutely must acknowledge before any progress is to be made.

All too often the media paints racial issues as the conflict between two equal but different groups that for whatever reason just can't get along. If only they would realize that we are all human, they would be better off. It is inside the mind that racism originates and is therefore a matter that can be solved without any political or economic changes. This view, often used in discourse about U.S. race relations, the Irish liberation struggle or the Bosnian conflict, does not in even the remotest sense reflect the historical realities of brutal and legal racial subjugation.

The people of Israel have been used by the United States as a convenient little tool to keep a lid on Islam and our hand (or Exxon's rather) in the oil. They have accepted the severe repression of their neighbors as the price for being the darling of U.S. Middle-East foreign policy, receiving more aid from us than does any other nation in the world.

I will no doubt be accused of anti-Semitism in some pejorative context before the week is through. But however painful it may be to accept one's place in a system that has wronged so many, it is the only way to begin to correct the matter. As whites in the United States are reluctant to accept the privileges gained from oppressing blacks to the lower ranks of society, so will it be difficult for Israelis who are accustomed to looking everywhere for the answers but within.

Sam McAfee is a Collegian columnist.

How do you rate the University Store?

C.F. Gorospe

URGGHH! I become outraged when I hear of people being discriminated against because of the color of their skin.

I finally got a chance to read the last number of issues of the Collegian which have been piled up in my room. Now I can place them in the recycling bin and actually clear the floor. The article about the rally that was held in the Campus Center a few days ago, "to draw attention to an altercation between students of color and the University Store security gave me a topic for my column.

Frankly, the University Store should be the last business to worry about losing money because of stolen goods, not that the student of color whom they ignorantly accused stole anything. He didn't. I'm stating that if students do steal from there, the University Store shouldn't fret about losing profit. Most of their merchandise is ridiculously overpriced anyway.

I am not suggesting that you go ahead and steal from the store, by all means that's your personal choice. I am suggesting that we think twice before buying merchandise there. The people in charge of the University Store are aware that sometimes students don't the have time to go into town or to the nearest supermarket, so we are forced to purchase what we need from them regardless of price.

I've been in this situation a few times, but I try to avoid it. Even if I had millions of dollars, I wouldn't shop there. Most of the prices are absurd. Also, it's not such an inviting place for students of color to shop in anyway. I'm particularly referring to the Art Supplies and the Customer Service departments. I took an Art class last semester and I had to buy art supplies there.

Let me keep it simple. The employees I encountered in both departments weren't very friendly. As odd as it may seem, I looked forward to buying my art supplies there. You're probably wondering why. I just said that I wouldn't shop there if I had millions. Let me explain. I was enthusiastic about observing the employees' foul behavior. Luckily, I was able to control my temper and tried to be reasonable. I wanted to see whether my accusations about their behavior from the week before were accurate.

Unfortunately, week after week, their attitudes didn't change. The same thing occurred again and again with different employees. They were rude and weren't exactly eager servers. Most of the time, the trip to the University Store became adventurous for me.

I've observed some of their behavior towards other students of color. Based or, my observations, I've concluded that most of the time, they serve students of color with remorse. I'm not sure whether my observations are accurate for all cases, but I can't completely dismiss them either, especially after the incident that occurred regarding a particular student of color. Every time I run into a situation similar to this, I try to avoid thinking that people are being rude because of color discrimination — I try to convince myself that these people are just plain rude, end of story.

However, this time I'm pretty convinced that the employees of the University Store are mostly discriminatory towards people of color. Again, I'm not going to dismiss this idea until I can discover for myself the changes made.

Nation Of Islam Press Conference
ON PETITION TO U.S. TREASURY & LIBYAN OFFER

The Salaam Restaurant — Chicago
August 27, 1996

JAMES MUHAMMAD (Editor-in-Chief, The Final Call Newspaper) — Ladies and gentlemen of the press, thank you all for coming this afternoon. The Honorable Louis Farrakhan will make a brief statement. I'm sure you all had a chance to read through the documents, after which we will entertain questions that you may have.

Joining Minister Farrakhan is Attorney Abdul Arif Muhammad. Attorney Rufus Cook. Chief of Staff of the Nation of Islam, Leonard F. Muhammad. And our minister of Mosque Maryam, Assistant to the Honorable Louis Farrakhan, Minister Ishmael Muhammad.

THE HONORABLE MINISTER LOUIS FARRAKHAN — In the Name of Allah, the Beneficent, the Merciful. We give him praise and thanks for guidance through His servants, the Prophets. I greet all of you with the greeting words of peace: As Salaam-Alaikum.

MINISTER FARRAKHAN — Ladies and gentlemen of the press, first, thank you very much for coming. We called this conference to announce that we will be leaving shortly for Tripoli to receive the Humanitarian prize, called the Gadhafi Prize. As you know, we have petitioned the Treasury Department for a license to receive the gift. We have not heard, definitively, as yet. So, we may not, necessarily, receive the money awaiting the Treasury Department's decision. We've also petitioned the Treasury Department for a specific license to receive a billion dollars or less, as a gift from Libya to the Nation of Islam for the purpose of advancing the program of the Nation of Islam.

The Welfare Reform Bill, that has recently passed, without a jobs creation bill as a companion piece, will leave many Americans in the lurch. As Muslims, we don't believe in welfare, however, I am a child of welfare. I know the value of welfare when properly used. And to leave Americans, black, white and brown without a safety-net, would only contribute to the hopelessness and despair among many segments of the American citizenry.

I heard on the television today a congressman saying that there should be a jobs creation bill. Should the Treasury Department permit us to receive this gift of $1 billion, this gift, properly administered by the brilliant financiers and bankers among our people could be leveraged to produce $10 billion in economic development. It will take many, many billions of dollars to assist the poor and the helpless, and the blacks in particular, from the pitiable condition that we are in. But since we are blessed to receive $438 billion dollars out of the American economy, according to the University of Georgia research, this $1 billion leveraged could attract ten percent of what we receive, back into our own communities for our own community development.

The creation of jobs, the building of low-cost housing, establishing banks, an economic development fund that will aid Blacks who wish to become entrepreneurs, housing development, international trade — all of this could be accomplished, should we be granted the license to receive such a gift.

It is our hope that the Clinton administration would see the value of this in terms of what it would do to turn despair into hope among our suffering people. And, should this be granted, this would give Louis Farrakhan an opportunity to show America that his efforts are sincere for the rise of our people and the rise of oppressed people, and our efforts are sincere for the safety and well-being of this nation.

With that statement, I would be glad to answer your questions.

CHANNEL 5, CHICAGO — You said you would go ahead and go to Libya now, while your application is pending. If the application is not granted, or if it has not been granted by the time you've been there for a while and need to come back, are you still going to accept the $250,000?

MINISTER FARRAKHAN — No. I will not accept the money until we're given permission...

FOX TV, CHICAGO — Minister Farrakhan, can you tell what me what you'll d o if the U.S. Treasury Department turns your request down. Will you take legal action?

MINISTER FARRAKHAN — Yes. We will fight in every way possible, because it is not the money. It's a principle. The principle is that our government has cut back on welfare, on entitlements, on Affirmative Action. Jobs have left the inner cities. To create job opportunities in low wage markets outside of America, leaving the Blacks, and the browns, and the peoples of the inner cities in the lurch. The government does not have a real urban policy. So in face of this, it appears that our government does not desire for us as a people to have friends unless they can dictate the terms of the friendship.

So, yes, we will fight, for what we believe is our legal right. And I will go across this nation, stirring up not only my people, but all those who would benefit from this. And I guarantee you, you will see a march on Washington like you've never seen in the history of this country. We intend to get justice, by the Grace of God.

ASSOCIATED PRESS — Some say you've put the administration in a bind because you'd be accepting the money from a country labeled as "terrorist."

MINISTER FARRAKHAN — America is a very, very powerful country. And because she is the only remaining superpower, she has taken upon herself the right to define. And she has defined certain nations as "terrorist." She has not yet raised a standard by which a nation would be judged in the international arena as a terrorist nation.

In my visit to Syria, and my talk with President Assad, he told me that he met with President Bush, when he was president of the United States. And President Bush was asking him to remove from Syria those persons who are considered "terrorists" or "anti-Israel." Palestinians. And according to President Assad, he asked President Bush to set up a standard by which the international community can judge any nation as a "terrorist nation". He said — and to this day — he has not heard from President Bush on that, nor has a standard been raised.

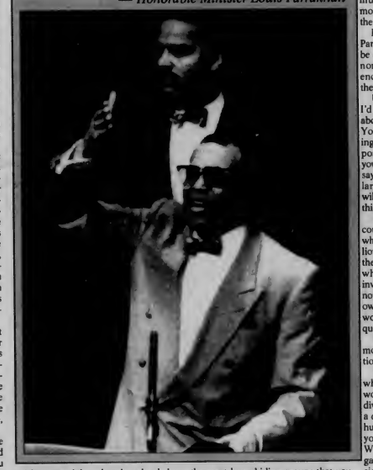
My question, in a fair, democratic society: In Congress, you label a nation a "terrorist" nation, to fit a foreign policy objective, which may or may not be just. You have never invited the Sudanese, the Libyans, or others that you call "terrorist" to come to America and defend themselves before Congress and before the American people. So, what in effect, you're doing, is using your tremendous power to label nations that you do not like, and then expect American people to suffer consequences because of your inordinate, mischievous use of your power.

We will challenge that. We cannot accept that. Our enemy has never been Muammar Gadhafi. He has never sold drugs in the black community to take money out of our community to finance a war with the Contras in Nicaragua. This was done by our own government! So will the real terrorists, the real violent people, stand up?

And when you do this against the very people that fought, bled and died to build your country, how dare you call some outside force an enemy, when you yourself have been the worst enemy of the rise of Black people with freedom, justice and equality!

UNIDENTIFIED REPORTER — What do you say to the relatives of people who were killed in Lockerbie? [second question unclear]

MINISTER FARRAKHAN — The families of those who lost their loved ones in Pan Am Flight 103 deserve justice and closure to this horrible episode in their lives. The two persons who are accused of being the terrorists who did this despicable and heinous crime are the basis now of sanctions against the Libyan people because Gadhafi refuses to turn over his nationals to be tried in America or in England, which it is against international law for America or England to try to force another nation to turn over her nationals to this country or to England.



Muammar Gadhafi said he will turn his nationals over to any third country. He would allow those two who were charged to be tried with Scottish jurists in the International Court of Justice at the Hague.

Now, 279 or so lives were lost. Is that correct? But — I think the man's name is Radovan Karadzic — who is accused by the Court at the Hague, of tremendous crimes against Bosnian Muslims numbering into the tens of thousands, and a warrant has been issued for his arrest. If the international courts, or the World Court is considered able to try a former head of state for those kind of crimes, why isn't that same court able to try those two persons charged with this crime?

A trial would put closure to it. And if they are guilty, the appropriate punishment should be applied to them, and if it is government sponsored, an appropriate penalty should be applied to that government. But to sanction Libya, and all of the people of Libya

"Well, you know, I've been accused of being a separatist, and I'd like to lay that to rest. You know, white folk, you are the real separatists, and you should be ashamed to put that on me. You brought us here in the bottom of ships, we were not integrated. Then you put us in the field, and you gave us little shacks and a few of us lived in the big house, but we were always separated. And just remember when the Emancipation Proclamation was signed and we were so-called set free, you never did allow us to live with you, did you? No. You gerrymandered us, you red-lined us, yes you did! You wouldn't even allow us to buried with you! You wouldn't even allow us to drink water out of the same fountain with you, and now you call me a separatist! Here's thirty years since the death of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., and the Kerner Commission revisited their findings of 30 years ago and said what? That there's still two Americas, one black, one white, separate and unequal. Farrakhan did not do that. White folks did that. So will the real separatist please stand up?"

— Honorable Minister Louis Farrakhan

without a trial — here's a book by Signet Press. This is an American publisher. It's called the Trail of The Octopus. It is banned in America, but it details the cover-up of Pan Am 103, that it really wasn't the Libyans. But this fits into America's foreign policy objectives to destroy Libya, because Libya and Iran are the two strongest anti-Israeli nations in the world.

Let's get at the truth. Where is the truth? So that those human beings who lost the lives of their ones can finally let their breasts rest in peace.

THE WALL STREET JOURNAL — Why do think Colonel Gadhafi will give you the money? Is there something — is there an Islamic tenet that one should share one's wealth? Is there something to base that on?

MINISTER FARRAKHAN — You know, Islamic nations are bound to give in charity to the cause of Islam. In fact, out of every dollar, there's a certain percentage that must go to the propagation of the faith. The establishment of mosques and schools and hospitals. This government has prevailed upon the king of Saudi Arabia to give money to the Contras. When it was against the law here for America to support the Contras, President Reagan prevailed upon the King of Arabia, and others, to give gifts so that the Contras could win their war against the government of Nicaragua.

What is wrong with Muammar Gadhafi offering the Nation of Islam, with whom he has had a long-standing friendship from the time of the Honorable Elijah Muhammad? And what he saw in the Million Man March so inspired him, and encouraged him, that he said he would place the wealth of Libya behind the Nation of Islam to achieve its objectives. And if you study the 66-year history of the Nation of Islam, we've never been involved in terrorism, although there are incidents of violence. Yet, on a whole, the Nation of Islam is one of the most law-abiding groups that you have in the whole of the United States of America.

United Press International [UPI] — During the Saviours Day speech and the Million March you told us that voter registration was going to be one of the new top priorities for the Nation. It is reported that you might even use some of the Libyan money for voter registration to persuade the '96 election. Sir, there's a whole lot of people in town this week who would really like to know who it is you are urging all these new voters to vote for, for president? Clinton? Dole ? Perot? Some candidate we don't know about? Who should they vote for?

MINISTER FARRAKHAN — We said in the document that you have that no part of this money would be used for political purposes. We are quite capable of getting our people to register to vote without using money from the DNC [Democratic National Committee], or without using money from the Republican Party, or from Gadhafi.

We're not here to say which white man will be better. Will it be Clinton, will it be Dole — in some silly "beauty contest." They all do what they have to do. What we're trying to do, is get our people to use their votes wisely, and leverage their votes. Not against a personality, but toward an agenda that is in the best interest of the masses of our people.

I, personally, cannot at this time say that Bill Clinton is the man to vote for, or that Senator Dole is the man to vote for, or that Ross Perot is the man to vote for. We will just have to see how they treat our agenda.

UPI — But realistically, sir, Jesse Jackson tonight is going to tell a lot of black Americans to vote for Bill Clinton. If you get this money from Libya, and they'll go out and vote Democrat, isn't this money just a big fat gift for the Democrats.

MINISTER FARRAKHAN — [laughs] Well, if the Democrats are wise enough to permit me to have it. They should get voted in. [audience laughter]

WBEZ FM, CHICAGO — I have two questions. Is this $250,000 prize in addition to the $1 billion that Muammar Gadhafi has —

MINISTER FARRAKHAN — It's separate from.

WBEZ — Secondly, are you prevailing upon people who came to the Million Man March to also give back to their communities and invest in their communities?

MINISTER FARRAKHAN — Yes. As you know, we proposed at the Million Man March, an African-American Economic Development fund. We felt that we should give to the community first, the audit that we promised of all of the funds that were taken up at the Million Man March. We did hold a press conference, and we submitted the audit, and we haven't heard any more. There was so much before about "where is the money going?" When we submitted the audit, we didn't hear any more.

Keeping up our word builds trust. Part of this billion dollars, should it be all raised, will be to build that economic development fund and then encourage our people to invest in themselves.

UNIDENTIFIED REPORTER — I'd like you to detail a little bit more about the National development fund. You spoke about jobs, housing, banking, trade, all the things that are very positive to our community. Would you elaborate how — we're going to say, positive, we got the billion dollars. What will it implement? How will African-Americans benefit from this money?

MINISTER FARRAKHAN — Of course, my brother, you know that when you have never handled a billion dollars before, you have to seek the counsel of the very wise among us who are skilled at managing an investment of such monies. We would not dare undertake to do this on our own. However, I would like, if you would indulge me — this is the last question? One more? All right, sir.

If you would indulge me for just a moment. I would answer this question on this wise:

Jesus was giving a criterion by which nations would be judged as worthy of chastisement or worthy of divine favor. And it was on this wise: a disciple asked Jesus, when were you hungry and I fed you not? When were you naked and I clothed you not? When were you out of doors and I gave you not shelter? When were you sick and imprisoned, and I ministered not unto you? And Jesus said, in as much as you have not done these things unto the least of these my brethren, you have not done it also unto me.

It seems as though both parties, the Democratic and Republican, have moved away from the feeding of the hungry, the clothing of the naked, the sheltering of the homeless. Good health insurance for the sick. And then a real program for those who are imprisoned to bring about real reform, rather than manipulating crime in the Black community to create a prison industrial complex for the good of industry and to the detriment of people.

Now, to answer your question specifically: what can a billion dollars do? Well, we first will collect the minds. A Mr. Rex Harris, whom you read of in the Wall Street Journal, he has a team of people, and there will be others, and we will sit and plan around food, clothing and shelter. There are tremendous acres of land that are available. We need to think about farming. And we need to think about Agribusiness. How much money do we spend on food? And if we put up supermarkets in all the major cities, and bought tens of hundreds of thousands of acres of land, or even lease it, and then went into good production, on a health standard, rather than profit motivated; and then begin to build houses, which will bring into play your construction people. Taking the wasted cities and rebuilding them. Building factories to provide some of the things that America is going overseas to have produced in the third world — we are in a third world condition. Let's bring factories back into the inner cities. A billion dollars would help us to do that.

We could strengthen the black banking institutions, that they would be able to loan money to the community people who wish to become entrepreneurs, or we could set up our own national banking system. There's so much that we can do, and, you know, when you've got a lot of money and you've got good ideas, ideas times money gives you power and leverage. And that's what we need to change the reality of black life in America.

WBBM AM, CHICAGO — If you would, sir, a two-part question. Number one, there had been some talk in the past about a separate black nation in the continental United States, does this talk of acreage bring us back to that concept? And the second part of the question is, directly, how much, if any, of the billion dollars would improve you and your family specifically. Would you get any part of that as a fee or reimbursement for your efforts in securing the money?

MINISTER FARRAKHAN — Thank you very much. I'm very well taken care of, as you can see, so I wouldn't need a dime of the billion dollars. I never thought, for one moment of any of that money accruing to me. However, you know that the Bible says the ox that treadeth down the corn is worthy of his oats [audience laughter].

No, I'm not thinking about anything personal, but you know, when you do good, good comes back to you. And that's nothing but fair and just. Your second part...

WBBM — The idea of the separate black nation in the borders...

MINISTER FARRAKHAN — Well, you know, I've been accused of being a separatist, and I'd like to lay that to rest. You know, white folk, you are the real separatists, and you should be ashamed to put that on me. You brought us here in the bottom of ships, we were not integrated. Then you put us in the field, and you gave us little shacks and a few of us lived in the big house, but we were always separated.

And just remember when the Emancipation Proclamation was signed and we were so-called set free, you never did allow us to live with you, did you? No. You gerrymandered us, you red-lined us, yes you did! You wouldn't even allow us to buried with you! You wouldn't even allow us to drink water out of the same fountain with you, and now you call me a separatist!

Here's 30 years since the death of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., and the Kerner Commission revisited their findings of thirty years ago and said what? That there's still two Americas, one black, one white, separate and unequal. Farrakhan did not do that. White folks did that. So will the real separatist please stand up? [audience applause] Don't charge me with that.

However, if we can not get along in peace, the natural thing for us to do is for us to separate, with justice. You and your wife can't get along? Go to a judge. Of course, you do seek alimony, something, especially when you and your wife helped built everything that you got. And we helped you get everything you got. So if there is a separation, then we want something for what we put in to build this nation to keep it protected.

But, I don't think it has to come to that, sir. I believe that time has moved us to the point where reasonable people will do justice. And if that doesn't happen, separation is a final option, but it is a FINAL option. Don't you think we can work it out? As Rodney King said, "can't we all just get along?" [audience laughter]

May I thank you all — I'm sorry for the heat. Our air conditioning had a problem, and we're working on it. But we can all get a cold drink, if you like. Thank you very much for your attention and attendance.

Al Pacino is a real life Godfather. Recently, some of the most powerful Mafia dons invited the star to dinner, to help him get into character for his upcoming movie Donnie Brasco. According to producer Mike Newell, Pacino was overjoyed and had a great time. Let's see, it's the Mafia — they'd probably knock him off if he said he had a bad time.

• Controversial rappers The Fugees have been banned from Ireland, after inciting a concert crowd into a riot. Apparently, organizers of the event had to stop the show after the group's frontman Wyclef body surfed on the crowd's heads. Four fans were rushed to the hospital and over 100 were treated by Red Cross specialists. Apparently the Fugees learned nothing from the tragedy that occurred at a recent Smashing Pumpkins concert in Ireland — a fan was trampled to death by an overzealous crowd.

• Attention all hopeful actresses: Tom Cruise is looking for a twenty-something female to play a small role in his next movie, the only catch — it's a non-speaking role as a nude dead corpse. Now I don't even think his biggest fan Rosie O'Donnell is going to jump to take this part.

• And the biggest movie of the summer, Independence Day, sets even more records this week, grossing over $299 million is just over three months. And people said Bill Pullman wasn't a box-office draw...

• Kudos to the animal lovers Paul and Linda McCartney They recently pulled the wool over the eyes of unsuspecting New Yorker readers by placing an ad for a free video guide to fur buying. Instead of receiving tips to purchasing a fur, the video showed animals being brutally slaughtered.

• Heather Locklear has agreed to pose nude for Playboy magazine for a reported $5 million dollars. But according to Cybersleaze, husband Richie Sambora is none too pleased. (I can't imagine why?) Locklear will appear on the cover of the February '97 issue and in a 12-page spread. This will be the first time the 34-year-old actress has appeared in the buff.

• Wedding bells are ringing for Lisa Marie Presley, just months after her divorce from Michael Jackson. She's re- marrying her first husband Danny Keough at Graceland in December. And diva Barbra Streisand is planning to marry actor James Brolin. Tis' the season for love, isn't it folks?

• In sadder news, Lush drummer Chris Acland, 30, hanged himself, on Oct. 17 in his home. No word yet on the future of the band. Actor Jason Bernard (While You Were Sleeping), 58, died of a heart attack in his car in Burbank, Calif on October 18.

• Money, money, money is always an issue in Hollywood and the sums are getting higher. Jurassic Park creator Michael Crichton will receive between $8 and $10 million for the movie rights to his upcoming novel Airframe. The novel based on an airline disaster (TWA 800, anyone?) will be out in December.

The leading hippie band of the day Phish loses its breath with its new release Billy Breathes.

Phish forgets to Breathe and nearly drowns

By Joshua Boyd

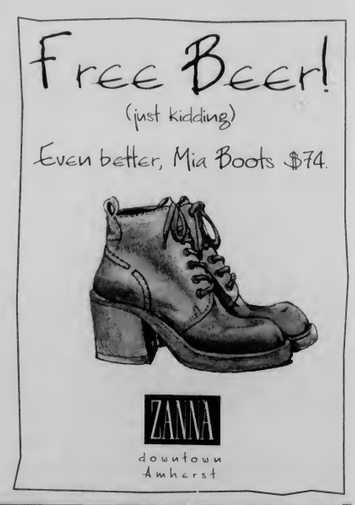
PHISH
Billy Breathes
Elektra Records

Their concerts draw thousands, encompassing both those who are devoted and just merely interested in seeing what the hype is about. Phish, in their live performances, tends to pull no punches and offers a catalog of different musical styles mixed with some of the most climactic improvisational movements in 20th century music. Most people who attend a Phish concert, whether they're on something or not, leave with a transcended look in the eyes.

So, the question with their new album, Billy Breathes, is why there is a questionable or upset look in the eyes after one listens to it. Sure, Phish has been confusing many for well over a decade now, with that confusion being turned to hate most times. But why would they abandon an individual sound that they've crafted and that many tribute bands and bands like Amherst's yeP! try and imitate?

The abandonment is not full-on. Billy Breathes, in its unfortunately rare moments, shows true imaginative writing, playing and adrenaline-fuelled, rising jams, such as the album's masterpiece, the instrumental "Cars Trucks Buses." This track takes the best of Booker T. and Jimmy Smith– brand soul-jazz and pushes the flexible envelope of that music flavor. Page McConnell shows he is truly a keyboard master on his own composition.



Other tracks that allow the listener to regain hope is the energized "Taste," with an interesting introductory interplay between piano, cowbell and bass with Trey Anastasio's quirky voice and lyrics bouncing over this, before the band stretches out and embarks on another McConnell-driven jam. The intimate production of "Train Song" is sweet relief from the generally over-produced (by Steve Lillywhite) album. "Bliss" is a short but sweet, light instrumental on what sounds like a 12-string guitar.

However, aforementioned, most tracks on the album suffer from over-reverbed production, trying to imitate the light production on 1993's Rift, a better album. Speaking of Rift, dedicated phans will realize that "Waste" "Isn't Nearly Fast Enough For" them. Many of the plain rock songs on this album are just that — plain to an irritating degree. "Character Zero," seems to have zero imagination and moves on false energy, compared with their past rockers like "Chalk Dust Torture" from 1992's terrific A Picture Of Nectar. "Prince Caspian," is a mid-tempo rock song that falls flat and "Swept Away" is a wispy love song — something Phish is too silly to play and have it taken seriously.

I'll only mention the band's legendary debut, 1988's Junta, because I want to let Phish phans know that all the money, the big arena concerts and the gradually extending distance from their fan-base, has taken its sad toll on the band: This is just not a hopeful new album. Let's all hope that they can always maintain strong, powerful, transcendent live experiences since their recent studio performances, including their last album, Hoist, have been letdowns. C

Cordelia's Dad gets wrapped up before their last electrical show.

By Daniel Bodah
Collegian Staff

Pioneer Valley tunesters Cordelia's Dad will put on their last-ever U.S. electric performance tonight. By the time the distortion is merely a ringing in your ears and the feedback a piercing memory, the only way you'll ever see the band play electric again is if you head over the Atlantic Ocean, where they will put the final seal on their era as rock stars. What's next for the band? After this show they will focus exclusively on acoustic folk.

Known for making rock 'n' roll join hands with American folk music, Cordelia's Dad has been turning the old new for years. On their albums Comet, How Can I Sleep?, Cordelia's Dad and the recent live release Roadkill, the band moves from punked-up covers such as "Will the Circle Be Unbroken?" to dark, brooding Appalachian folk tunes. Tim Eriksen, the group's lead singer and guitarist, says that to him a lot of these old mountain tunes are as raunchy and violent as rap or punk rock.

It's this intensity that Cordelia's Dad revels in with songs such as "The Dark and Rolling Eye" which in its time was passed over for publication because of its content. Dating from the mid-1800's, the song's lyrics are a straight-forward description of a man coming into town and getting a nasty disease from a woman he doesn't know. The way Cordelia's Dad plays it, the song almost becomes a dirge for the guy's lost health— very haunting, very eerie. Other songs include stories in which a woman's ghost comes to the foot of the bed and questions her husband about his new lover ("Little Margaret") and one truly chilling tune in which a returning adventurer rapes a girl who turns out to be his own sister.

Beside their acoustic folk playing, the band can rock in the best alternative vein, either while remaking traditional tunes or on their numerous originals. Their current lineup is Eriksen, singing and playing guitar and banjo; Cath Oss, singing, playing mountain dulcimer and a great little shiny- blue toy accordion; and Peter Irvine, singing and drumming. Violinist Laura Risk has also been playing with the band a lot lately, and seems poised to become a full-fledged member in the future.

If you saw Cordelia's Dad play in September at the Fire and Water Cafe in Northampton, you probably have a good idea of what their stage presence is like: unpretentious, direct and comfortable. The acoustic set is sure to include some of the jubilanly raucous a cappella shape-note songs the group has been doing recently, as well as plenty of sordid tales wrapped in folk tunes. As for the electric set, their last: expect a performance that doesn't shy away from brassy volume and raw, skilled guitarwork. You can be sure the band will rock the socks off the local fans who turn out to hear this historic set.

Cordelia's Dad will play the Iron Horse Music Hall tonight at 8:30 p.m. For more information, call 584-0610.

Secrets and Lies an exciting treat

Mike Leigh's newest film rightfully deserves all of it's Cannes

By Adam Levine
Collegian Staff

SECRETS AND LIES
Directed by Mike Leigh with Timothy Spall, Phillis Logan, Marianne Jean-Baptiste
Playing at Academy of Music

Secrets and lies are often the most common bond shared within families. It is unfortunate how much of our lives we conceal from the ones we love unconditionally. So many of us live our lives never fully understanding our parents and siblings and would exist as strangers under different circumstances.

Mike Leigh's amusing new melodrama explores this very concept. Secrets and Lies is a simple tale of redemption told from the point of view of rather complex characters. At the story's central core lies the relationship of a middle aged brother and sister who are saddened by their parents' deaths. They could find comfort from each other if only they could remember how to communicate.

Cynthia (Brenda Blethyn), the elder sibling, is the victim of a mundane, working class life who lives alone with her resentful daughter. She is exhausted by her existence, mostly as a result of slaving away her days in a factory. Her brother Maurice (Timothy Spall) is a successful portrait photographer, equally as lonely and whose marriage is failing as a result of his wife's infertility. Maurice has been reduced to living his life vicariously through his clients who he must plead with to smile. He is a gentle and humble man, but is as broken and melancholy as his sister. Together they are proof that a lack of understanding is often the most unfortunate family tragedy.

What happens next is one of the most endearing character studies filmed in quite some time. A young professional woman named Hortense (Marianne Jean-Baptiste) having recently lost her adoptive parents, attempts to seek out her birth mother. Her journey leads her to Cynthia, who at first pleads with her to forget all about it, for she feels unworthy to begin the relationship anew. Soon Cynthia realizes she has been given a second chance and only through Hortense can she find contentedness in her life.

At the film's climax, all the characters are brought together for the first time. There they must confront one another with the secrets and lies which have torn them apart. With the addition of Hortense we can only pray for them that things can change.

The most intriguing point in the movie is how it explores the confines of love. Hortense is black and her mother Cynthia is white. A lesser film would use this as it's central theme, but Leigh expresses it so matter of factly that to question it is silly. There are no undertones here, the concept of black and white are unessential aspects of the story's narrative. What is important is that both characters love each other.

The film's only criticism is that it moves about at an extremely slow pace at first. You start to question Leigh's intentions, but when the story does develop, you feel satisfied with it's outcome. At the film's end, we are left with an equal yearning for redemption and the hope that we could replace our own secrets and lies with trust and understanding. A-

Norman B creates mass bedlam in Butterfield

By Anna Feder

COURTESY RACHEL NEULANDER

Though the audience only numbered ten at the start, local poet Norman B began his performance with his usual heated fervor at Butterfield Residential Hall Friday night. Almost immediately after diving into his first song people began to pour in, evidently drawn by the immense bedlam he produced.

With a stroke of his tuning fork, to make sure he was in the proper key, the show began. He tested the audience by starting with one of his more well-known poems, one which had been performed at several open-mikes at Claudia's Cafe. The "first deviation" he performed, "Graveyard Shift" was a folk-like ballad the kind Norman B is known for.

Adding his personal ingredients of song, illustrated storytelling, comedy, poetry and assorted erotica, he allowed the crowd to stew. As his intensity escalated, he mixed his way into the crowd to check the consistency and flavor. Too mild, he adds a love poem, not about the "kind veggie" but rather the "hot and spicy" love. The poem "Do You See What I'm Saying" is the same one he's expected to perform at the Wheeler Gallery tomorrow evening.

To gather and stoke the enthusiasm of the audience he included them in the performance. "Give me a word and I'll create a poem with that word," he challenged. Someone suggested "Green" then he responded, "Okay, then I'll pick the word." The crowd laughed.

The performance was laced with political commentaries, usually criticisms of "The Drug War," which the "Norm," and you thought the age of the Druids was over... audience seemed to relate to.

The next element he injected to the audience was the story of "The Lady Worm and the Mackerel of the Sea." The story involved the aid of his cane and sock puppet which added a comic element in another poem about the E.O.E, Equal Opportunity Employer.

The whole performance was loud and fast, lasting roughly 40 minutes. The audience had grown considerably, most had wandered in mid-performance wrapped in blankets and carrying pillows.

When it was over some audience members lingered to soak up what they'd just experienced and played their drums; others intercepted Norman to tell him what they thought of the show. One girl offered to show him a tape of his performance on PBS which he hadn't yet seen.

When asked what he thought of the crowd, Norman had only good things to say. "They were very attentive and pretty enthused which is important. I think it's harder for people to get the message in a larger crowd. [This audience] was just the right size. I could make eye contact with everyone."

Norman B. will be performing today at noon on the Student Union steps as part of the Smoke the Vote rally sponsored by The Cannabis Reform Coalition. He will also be performing at the Wheeler Gallery at 7 p.m. tomorrow evening.

Pearl Street
Oct. 25

Friday night, Mephiskapheles brought their unique style of ska at Pearl St. wearing devil's horns and the devil's colors, red and black, keeping the young crowd skanking and singing along.

By the time Mephiskapheles hit the stage, the kids were ready to move. As always, they began their show with the chanting of "DOG GOD" and nearly everyone participated in this ritual. Trumpet player Osho Endo played incredible solos as did Greg Robinson on trombone.

The band's humorous satanic side was well represented with lyrics like, "My bologna has a first name, it's Satan." Most recognized by the crowd was the "Bumble Bee Tuna Song" that had the crowd in a choral frenzy.

The band played many more numerous favorites such as "Dance Me Not" and "Rank and File." It was almost cult- like how the crowd shouted and simultaneously raised their right hands at times.

Mephiskapheles ended with "Saba" a tune everyone was screaming and waiting to hear. The large portion of the crowd located in front of the stage bumrushed right onto the stage with the band. Twenty crazed kids got up and sang along with Worrell, who looked more than grateful that he had such devoted fans. This song had a nice slow island- Caribbean feel to it but sped up with power for the chorus in which all the kids chanted, "Saba, Saba, Saba, hey, hey, hey."

Crank$_2$0 serves up an extra caffeinated punch

Michael Mannix
Collegian Correspondent

Every day, American enterprise creeps into our lives and tries to make life bigger, better and easier than ever. From fuel efficiency to reduced fat to the microwavable, businesses are looking for a quick buck by improving and simplifying everyday life.

The beverage industry is certainly no exception.

Riding on the mediocre success of Jolt cola and catering to the demands of a health conscious society, caffeinated water has become one of the fastest growing beverages on today's market. A quick look on the shelves of many area variety stores attest to this fact with the recent appearance of Krank$_2$0.

Introduced in late August, Krank$_2$0, a product of the Interstellar Beverage Co. in Springfield, is the combined concoction of area industry veterans Rob Thomas, Mike McCarthy, Terry Butler and Matt Humphrey. According to Thomas, Krank$_2$0's director of sales, their product is answering the demand "for a beverage with a little kick, minus the fats and sugars." In an age where caffeine free is a popular choice among consumers, Krank$_2$0 fills the void for those searching for a beverage with boost.

Krank$_2$0 is the simple combination of water and the highest level of caffeine government standards allow. One half–liter of Krank$_2$0 contains 100 mgs of caffeine. Compared to 72 mgs in a can of Jolt, 45 mgs in a can of Coke, and 80–135 mgs in a cup of coffee, Krank$_2$0 could easily become a favorite of late night students, tired office workers and health conscious people on the go. Thomas states "people are looking for an alternative to the acidity in coffee and sugary sodas and Krank$_2$0 provides that alternative."

Despite disencouraging words from many doctors warning about high dosages of caffeine, Thomas claims "caffeine has not been proven to be unhealthy and the easiest way to ingest caffeine is through water."

While there are other caffeinated waters on the market, Thomas says Krank$_2$0 provides a "better caffeine delivery system." The result of six months of experimentation by chemists, their patented filtration system prevents caffeine from dissipating during shelf life.

Prolonged shelf life probably won't be a problem for Krank$_2$0.

"Water is popular and the public has grabbed the idea of caffeinated water with great enthusiasm" Thomas says. Already available throughout New England, New York, Oregon, and Washington state, Krank$_2$0 is being distributed internationally in Norway and Israel.

Krank$_2$0 is currently being targeted at those between the ages of 18 and 35. As a result, most of their advertising has been on college campuses and sidewalk demos.

Plans to go nationwide this winter include sponsoring the Gator Bowl in Florida and several snowboarding events in Vermont. In an attempt to identify with the younger generation Thomas and his associates pride themselves in "not being a suit and tie business."

Even with growing competition, Thomas believes Krank$_2$0 will be the leader among caffeinated waters in years to come. Relying on name strength and the flashy fluorescent label, Thomas expects "people will ask for a Krank even if the store they are at carries another brand."

Krank$_2$0. The choice of a new generation, or just the next victim of the beverage industry battles?

Belle: Is his bat worth all the trouble?

By Ken Berger
Associated Press

CLEVELAND — Albert Belle's numbers say he is the most valuable free agent of the winter, maybe of the '90s.

The problem is, Belle has been a top contender for another kind of MVP award — Most Volatile Player.

Belle, who has put together among the best back-to-back power seasons in decades, filed for free agency on Monday, the second day of the filing period, which lasts until Nov. 10.

Belle's agent, Arn Tellem, is scheduled to meet with the Cleveland Indians this week. Tellem said he did not expect anything to be completed until Belle can negotiate with other teams beginning Nov. 15.

"At this point, our goal is to talk to the Indians, and in two weeks talk to the other teams as well," Tellem said.

In March, Belle rejected a five-year, $38 million deal that would have made him the second highest-paid player in baseball after Ken Griffey Jr.

"The last time we really talked in great detail was a week into the season," Tellem said. "Everything's been an hold since then."

Indians' general manager John Hart said he knew all along that Belle would test the free-agent market.

"We are looking forward to negotiating with Albert and his representative in the very near future in hopes of keeping him a member of the Cleveland Indians," Hart said.

In 1995, Belle became the first major leaguer in history with 50 homers and 50 doubles in a season, leading the Indians to their first AL pennant in 41 years. This year, Belle batted .311 with 48 home runs and 148 RBIs as the Indians repeated as AL Central champions.

From 1991-96, Belle led the majors with 234 homers. Barry Bonds, the last free agent with offensive numbers even close to Belle's, was second with 217.

At 30, Belle is still in the prime of his career. But there are questions about his wttitude, his temper, his frequent transgressions involving fans, media, even teammates. His enormous talent comes with a disclaimer: Buyer beware.

Hart and Cleveland manager Mike Hargrove acknowledged this season that controversy over Belle's collision with Fernando Vina caused a distraction for the team.

There also were incidents in which Belle refused to give autographs to fans. And the record $50,000 fine Belle received for screaming at a television reporter during last year's World Series carried over to this season and coincided with Belle's decision to stop talking to the media.

Versatile offense leads Pats

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FOXBORO — Name it and the New England Patriots probably have scored that way. Pass, run, field goal, interception, safety — they've done it all.

In one game.

It happened Sunday when they scored two touchdowns in the last 85 seconds for a 28-25 win over Buffalo that put them into a three-way tie for the AFC East lead. It also made them the NFL's third highest scoring team.

That may change when the wind blows, the snow falls and the cold numbs Drew Bledsoe's hands in Foxboro Stadium, where the Patriots have four of their next six games.

"I know the weather's going to affect the scoring here shortly," coach Bill Parcells said yesterday. "I'm still looking for a little more offensive balance."

An improved running game should help, yet the resourceful Patriots can score in so many ways.

Against the Bills, Bledsoe threw for a touchdown, Curtis Martin ran for one, Adam Vinatieri kicked two field goals, pressure by Mike Jones forced Jim Kelly to ground the ball in the end zone for a safety, and Willie McGinest returned an interception 46 yards with 41 seconds left for a 28-18 lead.

The Patriots' 25.2 points per game are their most since the 1986 Super Bowl team averaged 25.7. In their first eight games last year, their average was only 14.1

In their last six games, five of them wins, they've averaged 30.3. Their total of 202 points is just three less than the team's entire 1992 production, the year before Parcells arrived.

"One of the better things we're doing is we're not throwing interceptions," he said.

Bledsoe has thrown 12 touchdown passes and just four interceptions, none against Buffalo. It's the first time in his four seasons he has thrown for more touchdowns than interceptions. He leads an offense with young players at skill positions and a solid offensive line that has been together for a while and kept Bruce Smith and Bryce Paup away from him.

He has many dangerous receivers — including Ben Coates, Dave Meggett, Shawn Jefferson, Terry Glenn, Keith Byars, and Sam Gash — and completed passes to eight of them Sunday for 373 yards, fourth most in his career.

Bledsoe "is a little more confident in the ability of some of the players," Parcells said. "He seems to be willing to throw the ball to just about anybody we put out there."

Troy Brown, who had just one catch all season, had three on the drive leading to Martin's 10-yard run, his 10th touchdown of the year, that gave the Patriots an 18-15 lead with 1:25 left. The drive covered 84 yards in just 1:22.

"Those are the drives you've got to put together if you're going to do something," Parcells said. "Sometimes drives like that really give your team a lot of confidence about their ability to do things under pressure."

Even with seemingly secure leads, the Patriots keep trying to score and it's paid off.

Against Baltimore, Larry Whigham blocked a punt and Tedy Bruschi returned it for a touchdown and a 46-22 lead with 7:53 left. The Patriots hung on for a 46-38 win.

Against Buffalo, an apparent insurance score by McGinest was critical because the Patriots gave up their third desperation completion of the season — Kelly's 48-yard touchdown to Andre Reed with 24 seconds left.

Minutewomen win heavy eights in Philadelphia

By Matt Perrault
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts women's crew team traveled south this past weekend to Philadelphia for the Head Of The Schuylkill.

This race is normally dominated by rowing clubs fresh off the world famous Head Of The Charles regatta in Boston. But, with the first ever cancellation of that event, UMass went into this race fresh and out to prove itself.

The Minutewomen entered their strongest boat in the heavy eights. For the first time in 10 years, a university would win this race.

With a time of 14:18.76, UMass crushed their opponents, beating second place Georgetown by a whopping 15 seconds for the championship.

"This was impressive because they beat Georgetown by 15 seconds and the closest Atlantic 10 foe was Temple, 40 seconds back.

"We have entered four races and won three of them. We are on top of the world for the spring," said coach Jim Dietz.

The women received a special cup award from the L'Oreal Corporation, the sponsor of the race.

Also in the heavy eights race were powerhouses like University of Pennsylvania; Columbia; and the United States Junior National team along with 20 other entered teams, all of which the Minutewomen defeated handily.

UMass entered three other boats in the regatta as well. The lightweight eight entered the race with high hopes but finished a disappointing sixth out of 12 boats. They ran a time of 15:27.25.

"We were fired up and something just didn't click. It was a major disappointment for us," said Captain Amy Kenny.

But, Coach Dietz wasn't too worried.

"Some of the girls were under the weather and I know that is a fast boat. I'm not too concerned with their time."

The lightweight fours had a strong showing though, finishing seventh out of 38 boats with a time of 17:29.09.

One of the surprises of the regatta was the showing of the junior varsity boat. They finished a fantastic seventh out of 46 entered boats.

Their time was great as well, running a 15:26.54. This was the icing on the cake for the Minutewomen who left Pennsylvania feeling great about themselves overall.

The Minutewomen rap up the 1996 season with a small regatta in Boston called the Foot Of The Charles next weekend and look forward to what should be a great spring season for women's crew.

Minutewoman Notes: On a side note, UMass Crew christened a new boat the day before they were to have run in the Head Of The Charles. The boat was named the Susan Roosevelt Weld, after our Governor's wife because of her accomplishments in promoting women's activities.

to an 0–22 power play so far in 1996. CC's offense drove it through out last year, but that has melted down like Chernobyl in the early going.

• Still, nowhere in this fabled land will you find a better collegiate hockey team than the one in Maize and Blue which marches into Yost Ice Arena to the triumphant beat of "Hail to the Victors."

Consensus No. 1 Michigan was the King of last year's final four in the Queen City, and the Wolverines are quickly off to a 5–0 start this year.

The Wolverines did not lose any key players and return a forward corps that includes preseason Hobey Baker frontrunner Brendan Morrison, along with Jason Botterill, John Madden (no relation), Kevin Muckalt and a slew of others, including junior netminder Marty Turco, that could start for almost any team in the states.

In fact it isn't just the folks south of the 49th parallel who come to gawk at coach Red Berenson's team, as Morrison, a native of Pitt Meadows, BC, will be profiled between periods on Saturday's Molson Hockey Night in Canada broadcast on CBC, while Botterill will appear later this year.

Botterill's hometown Winnipeg Jets might have flown south to Phoenix, but the national championship trophy won't fly out of Ann Arbor this year.

Queens, by virtue of the 15–9 decision, has earned its second straight top seed in the Eastern Championships. Navy again took the South division flag, and will enter the Championship with the second seed. Princeton, the other South division finalist, rounds out the top half of the draw.

The weekend wasn't a total loss for the Minutemen, as the nation's 14th-ranked club breezed throughout the first round, trouncing Massachusetts Institute of Technology, 22–5.

Freshman Timmy Troupis led the way for UMass, scoring four goals and assisting on two others as Yarworth's bench saw the bulk of the playing time in this match. Troupis (17 goals, 9 assists, 26 points) was just one of 13 Minutemen to tally goals in the rout.

Engin started and made nine saves while freshman reserve goal keeper Richard Huntley stopped six Engineer shots in relief.

In the semi–final match, UMass swam off against familiar foe, No. 19 Brown University.

This was a typical grind–it–out, Minuteman–Bear clash as the two teams traded goals in the first period and slugged out a defensive–oriented match that UMass held on to win 8–6.

Stahl had one of his more dominating performances of the season in this match as he found the back of the net four times and assisted on another goal. Gonen, Limardo and Slingluff each had a goal and an assist for the Minutemen.

UMass won this game by beating the Bears in man–up situations. The Minutemen converted on four of five opportunities while they held Brown to just 2–for–6 on the power play.

The Minutemen will have two weeks to lick their wounds before they defend their Eastern Championship title in Cambridge, Nov. 8–10. UMass faces sixth–seeded Slippery Rock in the first round, and assuming they advance, the Minutemen will play the winner of the Navy–St. Francis first round match.

Notre Dame prepares for trip to Ireland

By Nancy Armour
Associated Press

SOUTH BEND — Extra cleats? Got 'em. Video equipment? Packed. Gold-painted helmets, uniforms and pads? Check, check and check again.

Equipment manager Chris Matlock started packing two weeks ago for Notre Dame's trip to Ireland, and there's still a lot left to be done. The last trunk won't be locked until tonight, just a few hours before the team's 11 p.m. flight to Dublin.

"It's a matter of planning and coordination," Matlock said. "And you've got to have a great packing list. Mine's about two pages long."

Matlock began planning for Saturday's game against Navy months ago. The Irish are taking everything overseas that they would on any other road game — right down to the "Play Like A Champion Today" sign that hangs in their locker room.

Though Matlock has packed for plenty of road games and bowl trips in his six years as the Irish equipment manager, this was a little different. He had to think of every possible need the 85 players and coaching staff might have, because spare equipment for American football won't be easy to find in Europe.

It will take 13 trunks to ship all of the team's equipment, and Navy will bring a similar load.

"We've got some concerns," Matlock said. "Like telephone wires for our headsets. That's probably about it... Other things, you've just got to improvise."

A device was built so coaches can use their usual communications system at Croke Park, the stadium where the game will be played. Matlock and his staff had to find converters for all electrical equipment.

To make sure nothing is missed, Matlock's assistant, J.R. Finkelmeier, and assistant athletic director Bubba Cunningham left for Ireland yesterday. They'll check out the stadium and practice field, and call if anything was overlooked.

the over–confident Atlanta Braves.

This was the Yankees' year, period. And, they did it. They won it for manager Joe Torre, and his ailing brother Frank. They won it for the state of New York which is suffering miserably through the NFL seasons of the Jets and Giants. They won it for Babe and Yogi and the Mick and Joltin' Joe.

They won it for Wade Boggs, who had been on the other side of the coin a decade ago. They won it for Darryl Strawberry and Doc Gooden who have fought their way back to respectability in the league.

They won it for each other because that's the kind of team the '96 Yanks are.

Yankee fans, now there's a different story.

I was pretty hard on the Yankee contingent after their dismal showing in game one of the Fall Classic, but I have to say that I was impressed by the crowd in the sixth game. Then again, how hard is it to get excited about a game that could decide the series?

Anyway, a few poor, misguided souls at this fine institution that happen to be Yankee fans have taken it upon themselves to let me know what a bad job I'm doing in this weekly space.

As much as I appreciated the late–night calls from this one fine, young gentleman — who was so brave, he wouldn't even give me his name — I can't really say that I was all that fond of the way he talked down to me over the phone, not letting me get a word in edgewise.

My response to you: slow the bandwagon down. Where were you when Steve Balboni was the Yankees' power threat?

Then there were Mark and Brian who collaborated for an extremely intelligent little voice mail message that my roommate had the pleasure of hearing. A young scholar named Dan decided to leave some voice mail for me as well on Saturday night. I feel so popular.

Now, if these messages in any way resembled intelligent thought or coherent sentences, then I might not have objected to them so much. But, they were just rambling, loud, stupid rants about how great their Yankees were, and how dumb I was for calling them the Spankees. Like either of us had any bearing on what happened in the World Series.

So, from now on, I will refer to New York's AL entry as the Yankees, but thanks to those four intelligent young men, the New York fans will be known as the Spankees.

HOROSCOPES

ARIES
March 21-April 20

Your natural leadership skills shine. Don't be afraid to point out your expertise to someone who might have missed it. Pour all your energy into the job, though—if you slack off, it will show.

TAURUS
April 21-May 21

Considering a change of career? Try to schedule an interview with a person who can let you know all the ins and outs before you make a solid commitment. Then, you'll know your decision takes all the relevant information into account.

GEMINI
May 22-June 21

Focus on your goals if things seem tough right now. Even a distant goal can make a big difference when it comes to motivating yourself. If you're feeling really overwhelmed, consider relaxation tactics to muster your energy.

CANCER
June 22-July 22

Paying attention to business matters yields rich rewards. You could learn a lot just by watching. Brainstorming with a loved one could generate some intriguing ideas about your future.

LEO
July 23-Augu-t 23

Diversify your efforts this week to reap the benefits of variety. You'll avoid burnout and possibly learn a valuable skill. Don't be afraid to ask for help, or you could miss out on learning even more.

VIRGO
August 24-September 22

Although obstacles in your path have been dissolving lately, it's a bad idea to go charging ahead. Consider all the ramifications before taking decisive action. A lateral move might be more productive in the long run.

LIBRA
September 23-October 23

A dilemma presents itself, and it's time to weigh your options. Be careful that you're not trying to avoid a problem by taking the easy way out. That strategy could backfire on you in a big way.

SCORPIO
October 24-November 22

Something you've had on hold for a while could be coming to a boil on the back burner—pay attention. You wouldn't want to miss this opportunity. Don't shy away from the tough decisions—the rewards will be worth it.

SAGITTARIUS
November 23-December 21

A situation that seems hopelessly muddled can be seen in terms of black and white if you adopt the right perspective. Take this chance to learn more about how mistakes happen to avoid them in the future.

CAPRICORN
December 22-January 20

A goal that seemed unattainable could be almost within reach, but be careful that you don't ease up before it's yours. A distant acquaintance could hold the key to a difficult problem.

AQUARIUS
January 21-February 18

Work with the pressures and stresses in your life, instead of resisting them. You'll conserve your energy for something greater, and you could learn something about yourself. Things will calm down soon.

PISCES
February 19-March 20

A relationship that seems tenuous could strengthen suddenly under what seems like unusual circumstances. Trust your instincts, and don't get so wrapped up in your excitement that you lose your perspective.

UMass water polo has third seed in East after falling to Queens

By Fred Hurlbrink, Jr.
Collegian Staff

It's like deja vu all over again.

The Massachusetts water polo team went into the Eastern Water Polo Association North Division playoffs coming off a 9-0 EWPA regular season, just like last year. They advanced to the championship match against Queens College, just like last year.

And, just like last year, the Minutemen fell short, losing to Queens, 15-9, and going into the Eastern Championships with the third seed.

The three-time defending Eastern champs were victimized by themselves more than they were by Queens. In the second quarter, UMass coach Russ Yarworth lost the services of three of his top players — Brian Stahl, Aldo Roman and J.C. Limardo — all of whom were ejected for unsportsmanlike conduct.

"They did exactly what I told them not to do — lost their cool," said a frustrated Yarworth. "Queens came out physical, and we played their game."

Queens is a squad notorious for its aggressive, sometimes dirty style of play. They aim to frustrate their opponent into making mistakes, or to rile them up enough to upset them like they did to UMass on Sunday.

Stahl and Roman each had managed to score before their ejections. Stahl's goal elevated him to the 100-point plateau for the second time in as many seasons. Stahl has 68 goals, five 2-pt. goals and 22 assists, and he can't afford to miss any more action as the stretch run is upon the Minutemen.

"We have the talent to win the championship," Yarworth said. "They'll grow up, or else they won't play."

Sophomore Gabriel Marrero (41 goals, 64 points), the club's second-leading scorer, and freshman Rich Slingluff (28 goals) each picked up the slack after the trio's ejections scoring three goals apiece in the losing effort.

Senior co-captain Ron Gonen had a goal and four assists in the contest doing all he could to hold the Minutemen together without the overwhelming down-low presence of Stahl, Roman and Limardo.

Gonen's partner in captainship, Paul Engin, had six saves in the UMass net, but did not play well, making some costly decisions in the second half.

The Minutemen rallied to within three goals at 10-7 before Queens pulled away in the final minutes with a 5-2 run to end the game and account for the final mar-

Cat scratch fever hits Vt. Michigan looks to repeat

Puckheads are invariably a different breed of man, to the point that sometimes, when they think of the finest products coming from Burlington, Vt., unfortunately neither Phish nor Magic Hat No. 9 comes first to mind.

The delectable, fruity brew and zany, crunchy rock demi- Gods go unnoticed to some on the pristine shores of Lake Champlain. This year, folks in the Green Mountain State can think only of the No. 2 Vermont hockey team, which officially became the new Beast of the East on Saturday and, more so than the town's most famous band, has residents bouncing around the room.

When the folks at UVM talk about the French Connection these days they aren't referring to Trey Anastasio, or a new bakery in town, but rather Martin St. Louis and Eric Perrin, who along with J.C. Ruid form a line that can score more easily than Jenny McCarthy.

Perrin and St. Louis (pronounced Eh-REEK Peh-ROHN and Mah-tan Sain Lou-EE with a haughty french accent) have played together at every level since they were three years old in Laval, Quebec, a suburb of Montreal. Both 5-9 and winners of the ECAC Player of the Year award (St. Louis 1995; Perrin, 1996), each was a first team All- American and Hobey Baker finalist last year. In 1995 they shared the ECAC point crown, both finishing with 44, and together they broke UVM's single-season point mark last year, each recording 85 points.

But, they aren't completely identical for as an anonymous Union hockey fan in the local area asked, "were they born on the same day in Puerto Rico?"

Any doubts that this is not the best team in the East are unfounded and emerge only from the incoherent muttering of those hanging out in the hub along Comm. Ave., who've maybe had a Magic Hat hat trick or two.

In its two games this year, the Catamounts have won 5-1 at New Hampshire, picked second in Hockey East, and 4-2 at No. 3 Boston University on Saturday night before a standing room only crowd. UVM held BU to a stunning 0- for-7 power play mark, with all three members of what could be the nation's top line chipping in at least two points.

UVM made minced meat of Hockey East's top two teams, having Terrier and Wildcat ready for the Phish Heads back home to bag, tag and sell to the butcher in the store.

Combine the offensive firepower of an ICBM, strong defense, and an All-American goaltender in Tim Thomas, and in any ordinary year this is the best team in the nation. Unfortunately, as we shall soon see, the prototypical college town of Ann Arbor, Mich. harbors a true sight to behold, rendering UVM merely Beast of the East status.

• For us followers of the mighty Minutemen, the Cats' win at Walter Brown Arena is a double-edged sword heading into this weekend's showdown. On one hand, this is bad, real bad, almost like dangling Burger King's last whopper before George Foreman, because this should enrage the Terriers and have them come out flying on Friday night.

But, remembering to always look on the bright side of life, what it really illustrates is that sweet revenge on the hallowed ice minded by Jack Parker is hardly impossible.

The last time the Green and Gold took to the BU ice on Dec. 7, 1994 they were humiliated 11-1, a score just slightly closer than the last time UMass visited 285 Babcock St.

The Cats went in with a score to settle and scratched up Parker's team, in its own building.

"[That was] one of the worst, games of my life a couple of years ago here," Thomas said after the game. "I just wanted to exorcise some demons tonight and I think I did."

Here's hoping Brian Regan says the same thing at about 9:45 Friday night.

• Preseason prognostications have proven even more inaccurate than my fellow loquacious puckhead Jorma Kansanen and myself putting Pittsburgh atop the NHL's Northeast Division a few weeks back.

No. 7 Colorado College, a final four team last year, is 2-2 after a split with WCHA forever-.500 Northern Michigan, thanks, in part,

Yankee fans: the real Spankees

Fred Hurlbrink, Jr. on Baseball

I'm a baseball fan.

I'm a baseball fan who happens to have the opportunity to express his thoughts and opinions through a weekly baseball column in one of the country's largest college daily newspapers.

I'm a baseball fan who has the strange luck of being born in a state with just one baseball team — the Boston Red Sox — to whom I am eternally devoted. And along with this devotion comes certain responsibilities, some of which I abide by, and some of which I don't.

For example: as a Red Sox fan, I am pretty much obligated to foster a tremendous amount of ill will towards the Sox' rivals, such as the New York Yankees. This responsibility I have sternly abided by all season.

So, as you can imagine, as a Red Sox fan it was somewhat painful for me to watch the Yankees rattle off four straight victories to win their first World Series since 1978.

On the other hand, purely as a baseball fan, I couldn't help but marvel at what the new edition of the Bronx Bombers was able to do to the league's most talented team.

Measuring talent on a scale of 1-10, the Braves weigh in at about a 9, while the Yankees are probably somewhere around a 7.5, so what the Yankees did in this series is something that will rightfully be talked about for a long time.

After the first two contests (well, they weren't really contests) in the Bronx, it looked as if the Braves were going to be able to waltz to the defense of their Series title with three straight games at the Launching Pad in front of them, but the Yankees did anything but play dead.

The Bombers won fairly easily in the first game in Atlanta behind a vintage David Cone performance, but nothing came easy for either team after that.

Game four was an extra-inning slug fest that the Yankees pulled out after being down 6-0. In game five Andy Pettitte out-dueled John Smoltz in a battle of the two apparent Cy Young winners.

Then, Atlanta was faced with a pressure that they have not frequently been confronted with in the past two years. They had to win this game. After a day off, and a flight back to the City that never sleeps (who can sleep through the gun fire), the Braves had to win game six if they were going to defend their crown.

The odds were in their favor. Bobby Cox sent Cy Maddux to the mound against Jimmy Key, who he beat handily in game two. But, the men in pin stripes would not fold. They jumped in front of Maddux early, and hung on as John Wetteland earned his fourth save of the series capturing MVP honors in the process.

The Yankees proved flat out that they were the better team in this series. All year long, the Yankees just kept on winning, regardless of the circumstances. Cone and Key were hobbled with injuries for the better part of the summer. They had little power until Cecil Fielder came to town. Anything anyone could throw at them, the Yankees chewed up and spit out.

Nothing was going to stop them this summer, not the surging Orioles or Red Sox. Not the upstart Rangers in the divisional series, and certainly not

Women's tennis shows strength at Open

Steele and Gerasimova will advance to Rolex Championship

By Michael J. Nam
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's tennis team played with a competitive showing in last weekend's West Point Open tournament Saturday and Sunday capturing four titles in the process.

Jackie Braunstein (Cooper City, Florida) won the Flight "B" Singles competition with a powerful 6-0, 6-3 victory over Navy's Carrie Spannagel.

Liz Durant captured the second singles title defeating Mt. St. Mary's Candice Stubar in the Flight "C" Singles Consolation match 6-0, 6-1.

The other two titles came from the doubles round as Durant teamed with Caroline Steele to win the Flight "A" Doubles by a 6-3, 6-4 score over Army's Khanh Diep and Beth Scherer.

The UMass title victories were rounded out when Marie- Christine Caron and Noelle Orsini posted a highly competitive 7-6, 0-6, 6-1 win in the Flight "B" Doubles match against Jen Bair and Felicia March of Air Force.

The women had a solid first round on Saturday having three members of the team advance in the singles brackets including Steele

Steele defeated March 6-2, 6-3 and eventually fell to Julie Weiss of Air Force 6-3, 6-7, 6-4. The junior co-captain finished out the season with a personal 7-3 record for the Fall season.

Lana Gordetskaya (Lynn, Massachusetts)had a first round bye and defeated Maria Mood of Mt. St. Mary's 6-3, 6-3, but eventually fell to Lenka Hurtton of Fairfield in the Flight "A" Singles title match.

Senior No. 1 seed Durant lost a 6-3, 6-4 decision to No. 2 Patricia Riordan of Pace, and Caron was defeated by an identical score of 6-3, 6-4 to No. 14 seed Donna Carnicelli of also of Pace.

Both losses came in the first round.

The Minutewomen finished with ten singles and six doubles match victories on the last day of competition including the Consolation matches.

The women lost only three singles and one doubles match on the final day.

The women's team ended the season with a victory over Providence giving them a 5-2 record and nine consecutive semesters with a winning record.

The West Point tournament marks the end of complete team involvement for the fall season as only two competitors will be heading to the final tourney.

Steele and freshman Ola Gerasimova will be competing at the Rolex Championships in Williamsburg, Va. on November 7-10 to end the season.

Gerasimova, a standout freshman, has been a constant threat for the Minutewomen all season.

15 dead in recent attacks in Mogadishu

MOGADISHU, Somalia (AP) — Gunmen opened fire and lobbed hand grenades into a crowd yesterday in south Mogadishu, killing at least 15 people in one of the worst acts of violence this year in the divided Somali capital.

The shooting violated a two-week cease-fire agreement between Somalia's three main factions.

Eight men and a woman died on the spot after five gunmen driving by the busy Barubah junction opened fire with machine guns and threw hand grenades, witnesses said.

Six more people died later in the hospital and 15 others remained in critical condition late Tuesday, hospital sources said.

The junction is controlled by militiamen loyal to faction leader Hussein Aidid, who condemned the attack as "inhuman," and ordered his security forces to arrest any group suspected of being behind it.

Rival forces loyal to faction leader Osman Hassan Ali, known as Atto, were suspected of carrying out the attack, apparently in retaliation for the killing of three of Atto's senior officials late last month.

Mogadishu is divided among factions loyal to Aidid and Atto — who are fighting for the control of the southern half — and those of Ali Mahdi Mohamed, who control northern half.

President Clinton to visit Springfield

BOSTON (AP) — President Clinton and Vice President Al Gore will visit Massachusetts later this week in an apparent effort to give Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) a boost going into Election Day.

Kerry's staff announced the visits yesterday, although full details were not immediately available.

Tentative plans call for the president to stop in Springfield late Sunday en route to campaign appearances in Vermont and New Hampshire. The vice president is to visit Boston on Friday, making a midday appearance at Faneuil Hall before his own trip to New Hampshire.

Kerry, who is locked in a close re-election battle with Republican Gov. William F. Weld, said he wasn't sure what effect the visits would have on his race. When Clinton came to Boston last month, though, he announced funding for several projects and lauded his fellow Democrat's fight for the money.

"I'm delighted, obviously, to have him come in," Kerry said.

"I think any time the president comes through, it's helpful, but my sense is we were surprised."

The president's visit in particular was seen as a late attempt to shore up support for Kerry in the heavily Democratic western part of the state, since recent polls showed Clinton running far ahead of Republican presidential nominee Bob Dole in Massachusetts.

Nobel prize winner addresses 500 at UM

By Lisa Chiu
Collegian Staff

Wole Soyinka, world renowned Nigerian author and winner of the 1986 Nobel Prize for Literature, addressed a crowd of 500 staff, community members and students as a part of his Five College residency this week. His lecture, in the Student Union Ballroom, was a part of the University of Massachusetts english department's Troy Lecture series.

His lecture titled, "Creativity, Education and Modern Technology," was introduced by both Chair of the English Department, Steven Clingman, and english professor on leave, Ketu Ketrack.

Soyinka's earliest plays include, The Lion and the Jewel, and The Strong Breed. His most recent book, The Open Sore of Continent: A Personal Narrative of the Nigerian Crisis, has been received with critical acclaim.

A vocal opponent to Nigeria's rulers, he was jailed without trial for two years during the Biafran War. While he was incarcerated, he published his prison notes, A Man Died, in 1972. He fled Nigeria in 1994, due to his criticism of the current regime of General Sani Abacha, and has since been living in the United States.

Ketrack described him as a cultural worker, deeply rooted in the African tradition, and functioning as a visionary, "never untrue to his craft."

Soyinka began his lecture describing the experience which people of the Third World face in getting a university degree. Comparing their journey for a degree with the quest of the golden fleece, he said that some lucky ones could study abroad in England or other European countries, and those not as lucky were faced with the prospect of earning their degree through correspondence schools.

Soyinka said, at the end of this quest for the golden fleece, a great amount of knowledge and wisdom is obtained.

He cited the Guttenberg Revolution, which according to him, revolutionized the "dispensation of knowledge." With moveable type and the printing press it, "democratized knowledge and transformed society." He said that the Guttenberg revolution and the "open university," or correspondence schools, both represent a leap of knowledge.

According to Soyinka, our world is now in another revolution. In this new revolution, though the tools used may be different, the concept is not a new one.

"We must expect a certain loss in the quest. The golden fleece is everywhere and nowhere. How do the myths get translated to the internet?" Soyinka asked.

He said that this question is provoked by technology itself, adding that there are several pluses to technological advancement. They include: providing connectivity across different countries, having better ways to conduct research, more access to texts and libraries and in general entering a "brave new world."

But Soyinka also added that along with advancement, there are certain negative aspects as well.

"We are entering an immaterial world which doesn't depend on tactility, but insists on spacial dimension," he said.

He said that in a world of virtual reality, tactility, or points of touching, like caressing a painting on virtual canvases, becomes

Rally enlightens students on alternative candidates

ELIZABETH BROWN \ COLLEGIAN

Terry Franklin spoke at the "Smoke the Vote" pre-election rally yesterday afternoon on the Student Union steps.

By Beth McCarthy
Collegian Staff

The Cannabis Reform Coalition (CRC) held a "Smoke the Vote" rally yesterday, spotlighting libertarian and independent political parties who encouraged students to vote and consider non-mainstream candidates.

John Lanzerotta, treasurer of CRC, said that the rally's first concern was to convince students to vote. The second goal was to inform students of their options.

"We're saying there's a whole range of candidates out there," Lanzerotta said in his Introductory address to the crowd of students in front of the Student Union Building steps. "You should at least be considering them."

The speakers, who included Terry Franklin, an independent running for State Representative against incumbent Ellen Story (D-Amherst), and John Brickner, who represented the Libertarian Party, called for the legalization of marijuana.

"CRC is interested in encouraging individual liberties and these candidates are upholding individual rights," Lanzerotta said. "We wanted to give them a medium to express their views because a majority of voters believe that libertarian and independent candidates don't have a shot. We'd like to think otherwise."

Franklin said that he wanted to eradicate the government "out of your pocketbook and out of your body," referring to mandatory drug testings.

Franklin compared government officials, particularly those supporting the Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA), with dinosaurs. He described them as being "big and dangerous, and known to have small brains."

"There are two kinds of voters," Franklin said. "There's you and then there are the prudes and prohibitionists. They're not going to forget to vote, but I want you there too."

Brickner followed with a short history on marijuana use in the United States, saying that George Washington cultivated hemp fields, and that Betsy Ross had very likely used hemp to make the first American flag.

"Hemp is a part of our history," Brickner said. "The right to use hemp has been legislated away."

According to Brickner, one side of the government wants to "centralize, regulate, legislate and control your life," while the other side wants "you to be in control of and responsible for your own life."

The rally succeeded in swaying some students to vote for the

Weld & Kerry ride campaign trail

Tax cuts, crime, welfare & furlough discussed at final debate

By Glen Johnson
Associated Press

BOSTON — Gov. William F. Weld and Sen. John Kerry hit the campaign trial yesterday, determined to break a deadlock in their U.S. Senate race that remained despite an unprecedented series of debates.

Kerry was crossing the state, greeting train commuters in Boston, touring a Fall River factory and then heading west to Springfield to campaign with that city's former mayor, U.S. Rep. Richard Neal, D-Mass.

Weld himself was starting his day in Boston before making an appearance in Worcester later at mid-afternoon.

Two nights earlier, in their last of their eight debates, Weld and Kerry echoed their many earlier splits on crime, welfare and tax policy.

In a race between two popular incumbents, and one longing for controversy, moderator Ken Bode pressed Kerry early on with questions about reports of some free living arrangements and a car temporarily provided for him by wealthy supporters.

When Kerry tried to steer the discussion to other areas, the moderator persisted, asking Kerry if he thought he had done anything wrong.

"Do I think I did anything wrong? No," he said. "I should have stayed at my brother-in-law's longer."

"You did take a free car for 16 months without paying for it," Weld said. The issue was relevant, Weld said, because Kerry wanted to increase other people's bills through higher taxes and might have second thoughts "if he had to pay all his own bills." Both responses brought "oohs" and "ahhs" from the capacity crowd at historic Faneuil Hall.

Weld, the state's two-term Republican governor, was put on the defensive over campaign spending.

Weld was asked how he, who had so easily gotten rid of a $1 million debt shortly after being elected governor in 1990, would make sure checks were kept on campaign spending.

Weld said he supported a proposed federal bill, defeated last year, that would trade free television time to candidates who voluntarily limit their campaign spending.

Kerry, the Democratic incumbent, disputed the prevailing notion that the race is a dead heat, because Weld's "mask was coming off him now" and the people were beginning to seem him as an opponent of needy students and of those needing health care.

Weld said the race had become close as people began to appreciate his record in fighting crime, in welfare reform, and as a supporter of capital punishment.

Kerry, proclaiming himself a kindred spirit with President Clinton and fellow Massachusetts Democrat Edward M. Kennedy, blasted Weld for opposing recent hikes in the state and federal minimum wages, and for being insensitive to the poor in his plans for welfare reform.

Weld said he was for putting people to work, but not, like Kerry, with the government as a "micro-manager of the economy." About crime, Kerry said Weld has released 700 sex offenders since taking office, and allowed criminals to work in day care centers.

"The fact is governor... I think most criminals in this state are less frightened of you than Inspector Clouseau," Kerry said, referring to the bumbling detective in the Pink Panther movies.

"You were sending sex offenders home for the weekend," Weld retorted, a reference to the years when Kerry was lieutenant governor under Michael S. Dukakis.

Dukakis' 1988 presidential campaign was assailed for such furloughs, most notably that of Willie Horton, who assaulted a couple after fleeing custody during a furlough.

Weld again accused Kerry of having a "mania" about programs to help drug addicts and other criminals.

"No, governor," Kerry said sternly, "I tend to look at it from the point of view of a human being thinking about how we can make things work."

On other familiar ground, Weld also condemned Kerry's criticism of his tax cuts, which have benefited businesses.

Panel discusses diversity in athletics

By Joseph Fountain
Collegian Staff

SPRINGFIELD — University of Massachusetts' personalities led a panel discussion at Central High School about both ethnic diversity in sports and relations with the City of Springfield.

All the speakers, including UMass men's basketball Coach James "Bruiser" Flint, stressed the importance of education in the lives of young people.

The night began with an address by Springfield Mayor Michael Albano, a co–sponsor of the event. He talked about the importance of the University of Massachusetts — Springfield partnership.

"Diversity is Springfield's greatest asset and with the UMass partnership we can utilize diversity to make Springfield a winning city," Albano said.

Ronald Story, a professor of history at UMass, said diversity in sports is important, specifically in baseball.

Certain coaches, Story said, such as former Philadelphia Athletics Manager John McGraw, picked players who were on the fringe of society such as deaf, Indian and Cuban players — generally not accepted in mainstream popular culture.

According to Story, it was only when the talent pool of whites was dwindling that Branch Rickey, owner of the Brooklyn Dodgers, decided to utilized the untapped resource of the "Negro leagues."

"When Jackie Robinson entered the game," Story said, "the Dodgers found a use for diversity the same way Springfield can with its diversity."

Mike Ratte of WGGB Springfield, introduced Flint and former UMass basketball player Derrek Kellogg. He asked the audience, "what does it take to make a winning team?" and "how does it change the game when you add ethnic differences to the game?"

The panel proceeded to discuss ethnic diversity and how the UMass basketball team united itself behind the goal of winning.

The discussion then turned to questions from the audience. Ed Anderson of Dunbar Community Center, a place where Derek Kellogg and the NBA's native son Travis Best played, asked how Division I teams balance athletics and academics.

"Bring kids up to UMass and show them what they could have with academics," Flint said, in response. He also talked about the NCAA rules regarding grades and the importance of an education.

"If pro basketball is the car then education is the gas," Flint added. He went on to say, "The pressure on my players isn't to perform but to prepare, because if you are prepared, you will succeed.

"I wasn't 'Joe Academic' and I had some tough lessons. You have to have something to fall back on. Let them know if they don't do their school they won't play sports, without school there is no sports," Flint said.

Springfield residents seemed pleased with the event and specifically with the university's interest in the city.

Meghan Anzelotti, a sophomore at Central High School said, "having Bruiser Flint and Derrek Kellogg come here boosts school spirit. It's great having them here."

Howie Burns, coach of Central High School Basketball team said he was pleased that Kellogg spoke at the event, and cited him as a specific role model for students struggling to become better athletes and better educated.

added to our "aesthetic system" through the use of electrodes.

There is the exclusion and the death of the imagination in a virtual world. According to Soyinka, imagination, is "...personal not click induced."

There is also the loss of the authority of the individual and a loss of community. He cited the example of business conferences which he detests, that he would rather have a group of people congregating physically together than everything preformed through technology.

He used the example of the "Neural baby," or a digital pet, which has a capacity to respond to emotions, adding that they reminded him of the sinister dolls in horror movies who kill people. According to him, the pet concept is Freudian and like the story of Frankenstein, is a constant metaphor of scientific advancement.

He closed by saying that the search for the golden fleece is actually the search for knowledge, that knowledge is obtained in the journey of finding the fleece and he tied that quest for knowledge with the journey into cyberspace.

"It is a journey... [to a] brave new world, surfing into the new millennium," Soyinka said.

Soyinka entertained questions from the audience at the end of his lecture. One audience member asked him to address the sexism which occurs in cyberspace, citing an example where a man on the internet asked her sexually explicit questions while she was inquiring about a job opportunity. Soyinka replied that she should address it the way that she would any other occurrence, and that she'd say, "You are a dirty cyberdog."

Libertarian and Independent parties that were represented.

Scott Zagame, a junior biology major, said that he was still contemplating who to vote for, but this rally has given him some serious thought to voting Libertarian.

"I'm sick of all the government crap that's going on," Zagame said. "Sick of all the corruption."

Beth Barrett, a sophomore woman's studies and education major, had never heard of the candidates who spoke, but said that she would be more likely to vote for Franklin and the Libertarian presidential nominee, Harry Brown after hearing about their stand on giving freedom back to the people.

"I think the government has too much control over our lives," Barrett said. "We should be joining together as a community and I think the government makes us think we're separated and not linked together."

Chris Godfrey, a junior French major who attended this CRC event, however, said that the rally would not effect the choices he will make this November, nor did it succeed in convincing him that marijuana should be legalized.

Yeltsin surgery set for next week

By Candice Hughes
Associated Press

MOSCOW — Boris Yeltsin's condition is improving and the Russian president could undergo heart surgery as early as next week, an American surgeon consulting on the case said yesterday. Dr. Michael DeBakey told The Associated Press that he would travel to Russia this weekend to consult with Yeltsin's doctors..No date has been set, but "we hope to go ahead with it next week," DeBakey said from Houston.

He said Yeltsin's condition has been improving, and that doctors had made progress in treating Yeltsin's severe anemia and a thyroid dysfunction. Those problems, he said, appear to have been "pretty well corrected."

DeBakey said Yeltsin needed a triple or quadruple coronary artery bypass, although he would not know specifically what the Russian doctors plan to do until he arrives in Moscow.

The date of the operation has been a moving target, with Yeltsin at first saying he expected surgery in September. The Kremlin later said it would take place sometime between mid–November and mid–December.

DeBakey has said several times that the prognosis for the 65–year–old Russian leader is good.

There was no comment from the Kremlin about DeBakey's assessment. Kremlin doctors said earlier yesterday that the "final stage of preparations" for surgery had begun. Their statement, carried by Russian news agencies, said Yeltsin's condition was satisfactory. It did not mention a date for the operation. The Kremlin, which has been less than forthcoming about Yeltsin's health, chose instead to emphasize the fact that the president spoke on the phone with his chief of staff.

It wasn't much to work with, but the president's men were relentless in their campaign to burnish Yeltsin's image as a can-do kind of guy despite his illness.

The popular daily Komsomolskaya Pravda even ran an interview with the chief Kremlin doctor, portraying Yeltsin as a take–charge, headstrong patient.

"He has his own vision of the problem, his own understanding of his body," Dr. Sergei Mironov said. "So if we change his treatment in any way, or use a new medicine, we first have to convince him that it's necessary."

Yeltsin scrapped all meetings this week to undergo medical tests, but listening to his staff yesterday, it sounded as if he were working non–stop.

He gets "reports every day and works on documents from 1 1/2 to two hours," Mironov said in the interview. "He reads through everything that he signs."

The president's office announced that Yeltsin was giving out a new batch of awards and had named two new members of his security council. Anatoly Chubais, his chief of staff, said he'd spoken with Yeltsin yesterday on subjects ranging from opera to local elections. In recent weeks, Yeltsin has held almost daily meetings at the government health resort outside Moscow where he is staying. Russian television has dutifully reported each meeting.

On Monday, however, television profiled Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin, who would take over if Yeltsin dies or is incapacitated.

Yeltsin has said he'll temporarily transfer his presidential powers to Chernomyrdin during surgery, and the prime minister is expected to remain in the forefront during the president's recuperation.

New polls show Americans apathetic

By Mike Feinsilber
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The election is almost upon the country and about all that remains is to browbeat the American people for the next six days to shame them into voting.

Won't work. The experts say less than 55 percent of eligible Americans will participate, and they have some theories on what that says about the world's most celebrated — and maybe its most casual — democracy.

A century ago, 80 percent of Americans routinely voted. But in the last 30 years, turnout has gone down. From 64 percent in 1960, when John F. Kennedy was elected, it slid to just barely above 50 percent in 1988 before squiggling up to 55.2 percent four years ago.

But the 1992 race had an incumbent president on the ropes, an attractive challenger and a feisty third–party insurgent. This time around, none of those elements apply and that has a lot of people worried that the participants will barely outnumber nonvoters. If people in only nine states got to elect the president next Tuesday, those in the other 41 would be outraged.

But that's what will happen, in effect. The number who will vote is roughly equal to all the voters in the nine largest states, California, New York, Texas, Florida, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Ohio, Michigan and New Jersey.

"There seems little question that turnout will be down, perhaps sharply," says Curtis Gans, who has been thinking about voter turnout for 20 years. He directs the nonpartisan Committee for the Study of the American Electorate.

Things would even be worse if Congress hadn't enacted the motor voter law, allowing people to register where they apply for drivers licenses and in other accessible places. That law registered between six million and nine million new voters this year. Still, Gans predicts that turnout on Tuesday will range between the 50.1 percent participation in 1988 — the record low in modern times — and the 55.2 percent rate in 1992.

Compare that to a century ago. In 1896, when Democrat William Jennings Bryan ran against Republican William McKinley, 79 percent turned out — including an astonishing 96 percent in Iowa and Illinois.

In those days, the parties differed sharply; now they often gloss over differences. Believing their well–being was at stake, whole classes of people associated with a party.

"Parties don't do mobilizing any more," says Walter Dean Burnham, voting expert at the University of Texas. "The Republicans don't mobilize the lower orders," he said, and the party that traditionally played that role, the Democrats, "became yuppiefied, gone upscale."

What worries Gans most is the tendency of young people to shun voting. Only 12 percent of those 18 to 20 voted in 1994, he says, and a majority of their parents don't vote either.

Voting matters, Gans says, because it is the least one can do to participate in democracy. People who don't vote, he says, generally don't volunteer, don't write letters to the editor, don't organize — and that's not good for a society that depends on citizen action.

This week, all the candidates are appealing to voters to vote. Churches, editorials, civic groups beat the same drum.

President Clinton lectured the citizenry during his last debate with opponent Bob Dole. "The American people need to be a little more responsible and think about whether there's a connection in their lives and what we do in Washington," he said.

Stonewall's unanswered future

While Chancellor David K. Scott led the kickoff gala for Campaign UMass, the Stonewall Center is facing drastic budget cuts which leaves many questions about the Center's future unanswered.

The Stonewall Center, located in Southwest, serves as both an educational and cultural resource for the gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgendered (GLBT) community at the University.

For the past three years, the Chancellor's Task Force for GLBT issues has funded the center with $10,000 to support the Brown Bag series which has brought prominent members of the GLBT community for on-campus lectures and discussions.

The Dean of Student's Office has also cut their funding for the program by up to $8,000 leaving the Center at a loss of $18,000.

Fortunately, the Center secured a one-time grant from the Student Affairs Office for $7,500. While this may be enough to keep the Stonewall Center afloat for this semester, major financial problems lie ahead.

Although Tom Robinson, vice chancellor for Student Affairs, has cited the Center's increasing base budget, which has risen over $44,000 in the last four years, the Stonewall Center will no longer have the funds to support essential activities such as the Brown Bag lecture series and monthly poetry readings.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian feels the University must find a means to help finance the Stonewall Center which has proved itself to be an integral part of campus life.

Still searching for peace

Henry J. Brier

Contrary to present-day delusional thought pointing squarely to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu as culpable for destroying the Middle East peace process, deterioration of the dialogue between the so-called "partners for peace" began almost exactly one year ago right now.

Former Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Palestinian leader Yassir Arafat maintained diplomacy which could not be considered a concrete foundation even while the men were at their best. As these two were intricately involved with negotiations, a particular event involving both individuals brought on the deterioration.

Fathi Shikaki, who in 1981 founded Islamic Jihad in the Gaza Strip, was entirely unabashed about his belief that "true peace means Israel does not exist," which he repeated often. Islamic Jihad, under Shikaki's leadership, did not recognize any Israeli–Palestinian accords and, in efforts to derail the peace process, were responsible for almost 40 Israeli deaths.

Shortly after having founded the fundamentalist organization whose main objective is Israel's destruction, Shikaki was expelled from Gaza and he moved on to Beirut, Tehran and Damascus, the last of which is the place of his most recent address.

After having been informed of Shikaki proudly declaring both his ideology and his destructive actions, Prime Minister Rabin vowed to the terrorist leader that Israel "will pursue you and eliminate you, and no border will constitute an obstacle to us."

On Oct. 26, 1995 Shikaki was enroute from meeting with Libyan leader Moammar Qaddafi in Tripoli to Damascus when he stopped over in Malta, a Mediterranean island south of Sicily.

Despite the fact that he was traveling alone under an assumed identity upon a Libyan passport, and although he had shaved his beard and attempted to uphold an incognito profile while stopping over, Fathi Shikaki's past caught up with him.

Toting a nine millimeter pistol equipped with a silencer, a gunman on a motorcycle with a stolen license plate shot from point–blank range and killed the terrorist.

Leaflets distributed days later throughout the Gaza Strip vowed revenge for the three "Zionist bullets," none of which had left any spent cartridges.

When asked by reporters if he had ordered Shikaki's death, Prime Minister Rabin declined comment and said that if the terrorist were dead he would not be unhappy.

On the other hand Yassir Arafat, the Nobel Peace Laureate, who had gained recent fame for peaceful initiatives, was despondent, as he eulogized and praised who he considered to be a martyr.

Slightly more than one week later at a Nov. 4 rally in Tel Aviv attended by peace process supporters, Prime Minister Rabin delivered what turned out to be his final speech.

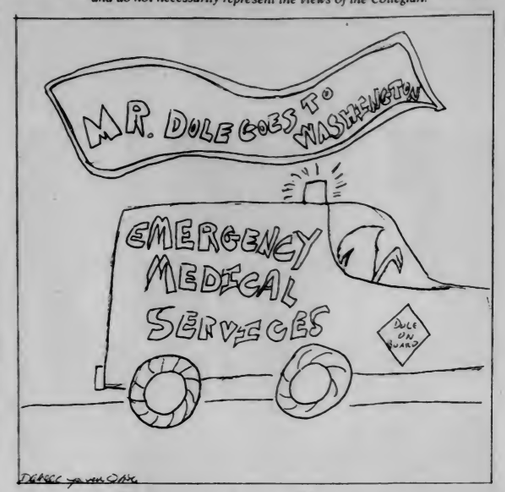
Foreign Minister Shimon Peres was on stage near the podium, as were ambassadors from Egypt, Jordan and Morocco. Close Egypt–Israel correspondence resulted in the 1979 Camp David Accords. Prime Minister Rabin and King Hussein of Jordan completed their peace pact in 1994.

"We found a partner for peace among the Palestinians — the PLO — which used to be an enemy and stopped terrorism," the prime minister said toward the end of his speech while the Arab diplomats stood behind him. "Without partners for peace, there is no peace."

Minutes later, while leaving the rally, Rabin, who was loosely protected by bodyguards, fell victim to terrorism originating from within his own constituency. He was cut down by a religious zealot opposed to the leader's policies.

Rabin was the catalyst for the peace process, and his memory is respected as a proven and fearless military and political leader, while his presence as prime minister was feared by and intimidating to many.

Had the fragile peace process gone through to fruition, perhaps it could have provided for mutual cohabitation, ultimately resulting in the emergence of a Palestinian state.



Arafat, democratically elected as leader of the Palestinian autonomy last January, plays so incredibly atypical a role, as many believe that he holds more control over fundamentalist violence.

However, in the event that Arafat falls victim to the same fate as his counterpart for peace, it should surprise no one. The leader finds himself in an intensely pressured setting, fielding heated criticism from many whom it is his responsibility to satisfy. Yet he will (as proven by the fact that he has) continue to praise perpetrators of terrorism.

Examining abortion

Have you ever listened to a self–delusional person? Someone who says such outrageous things that you cannot understand how they actually believe themselves? Don't get me wrong, I too am delusional. I believe that people actually read my columns, but seriously folks, severely delusional people frustrate me.

I was having dinner a few days ago with a friend of a friend in Southwest who believes that every woman he desires wants to screw him on the spot. He informed a mutual friend of ours that the beauty this mutual friend was dating all but propositioned him the night earlier, but he restrained out of respect for this friend. This man is a balding, overweight, arrogant loudmouth. If this man can attract more than 1, who is neither balding nor overweight (I won't comment on the other two) then something is excruciatingly wrong with the universe.

Christopher Hasset

I was eating lunch with Zephyr a few days prior. He was complaining about his friend, Louis, who had for the second time caught the eye of some beauty Zephyr was trying to pick up. I reminded myself not to introduce any of my dates to Louis.

During lunch, Zephyr and I were discussing the pro–life posters we saw on the PVTA busses and what a stir they were causing. This discussion brought to light a peculiar stereotype I had about gays. I thought Zephyr, who is gay, would be pro–choice. It seems that the Gay/Lesbian civil rights movement is intimately intertwined with the Women's Rights movement. Anyway, I was wrong.

It is probably remnants of his rigorous Christian upbringing, he said. Zephyr was brought up one of Jehovah's Witnesses. In fact, it seems that he is not even that upset with abortion itself then the logic pro–choicers use in their arguments.

I am no expert when it comes to abortion. It is not something I have to give great thought to since I am not a woman. However, pro–choice (I hate to use the word, but it applies) propaganda states that most if not all abortions take place before the nervous system is in place or the heart starts beating or some such biological chronology. The few pro–choice women I have discussed abortion with in the past were quite frank when they said that they felt the fetus was not human, not a life and therefore nothing was lost when it was aborted. Zephyr did not agree.

So many things are tied up in our genetics. This much is true. Intelligence, musical and athletic ability, temperament, the way you look, sexuality; all these can be greatly enhanced or repressed through certain genes. Now life nurtures you and some talents are accentuated and others are relegated to mere "hobby" status, but they are there nonetheless. So much of who we are exists already even as a fertilized egg.

That fertilized egg is a cell, a living cell. That fertilized egg, like all living things, has DNA. That DNA is individual and unique to that person. Normally, no one else in the world has it. So if a cell is a life–form and it has human DNA then does that not make it a human life–form?

Zephyr also used an argument I thought was, if nothing else, inventive. He compared aborting a fetus to unplugging the respirator of someone on life support. After all, one argument is that child cannot live on its own and therefore it is the right of the woman to discontinue being host to this being. A person on life support cannot live on their own and someone is certainly paying for this support. If the doctor said there was almost certain recovery, would that be an "abortion" and therefore legal? Inventive, no?

Once the child is out of the body it still cannot live on it's own. It is totally dependant on the mother for food, warmth, affection and support. Yet it is illegal for anyone to harm such a child.

What about rape? Should a woman that had a child forced upon her be responsible for bring it to term? She can give it away for adoption later, but carrying a child through pregnancy is traumatic enough without dealing with the after effects of rape.

What does this child know of rape? He or she is not responsible for what happened and should not be the whipping boy for someone else's misdeeds, as horrific as they are.

It sounded to me like Zeph was pro–life. He disagreed and in this next point he had my total agreement. Abortion is a difficult choice for any woman to make. It is not something that anyone wants to go through. If a woman chooses to end a pregnancy, under the law it is her right to do so and she should not be physically impeded in any way shape or form. It is on her conscious and if her conscious is clean, God bless her, he said.

But, do not dehumanize the life which is gone. Know what is being done. Do not delude yourself into thinking that merely some parasite is being gotten rid of. Know what it is that must be on your conscious. Self–delusional people frustrate him too.

Just one of the guys

Tara MK Connelly

Ever since I was a little girl I wanted to be a boy. No, I didn't want to literally be a boy, but at an early age I figured out that guys had a lot more freedom than I ever would. Maybe it was because I was brought up with very traditional parents who believed m women knowing how to cook, clean and "be lady–like." My grandparents, relics from the potato famine, also thought in like. I was told frequently not to run, not to jump and in general to "keep it down."

I would watch with envy when my brother would take off into the woods with a gaggle of boys off to play war and cops and robbers. What was I to do while they were chasing the bad guys? Why play tea party with my sister, of course. But as I got older things changed.

I wanted to run, jump leap and soar. I had no fear, knew no restraints, I was like an ad for a Nike product. My dreams were not limited by traditional roles, I wanted to seize life and all it had to offer. Bravely I would follow my brother and his friends into the woods. I would crouch low to the ground, heart beating fiercely, ears straining — waiting for "the enemy" to come around the corner. Twice my size and weight I would wrestle him down, punching and kicking unmindful of my own pain. I refused to give up and I would accept nothing other than "uncle" or a grudging truce.

Well, a lot of things have changed since those days in the woods. I grew up, they grew up and somehow being a boy wasn't all that important because I realized that as a girl I could do just fine, thank you. But overcoming personal limitations is nothing compared to limitations set by others. Often times women are put in positions where they feel as if they have to prove to others they are up to snuff, not because they don't believe they are, but because they believe others doubt their ability. Sometimes this type of pressure doesn't exist, but the concept remains there, imprinted in their skull. Today's women are constantly trying to prove themselves because of a social stigma; they get more stressed and feel more pressure than their male counterparts. While most men would chalk a loss up to fate, women are more inclined to chalk it up to personal weaknesses.

Being m a situation where I am responsible for my own food, shelter and clothing I am constantly confronted by prejudices society sets up and that I set up against my own self. It is truly a unconscious thing. During job interviews or considering major moves in my life questions like: "am I smart enough?" "Do I look smart enough?" circle my mind like vultares over a carcass. With no Stewart Smalley to litp words of confidence, it is up to myself to talk my way out of mental barriers and indecision. I believe many women feel the same way. It isn't that I don't have support. I have a bunch of friends who make Thelma and Louise look like Peppermint Patty and Marcie. No, they aren't incredibly imposing looking or brash. They don't rob convience stores nor chew tobacco, but they do have self–confidence and the ability to install it into others. In short they have the ability to get things into gear.

Ironically my second biggest ally is my boyfriend, a person who I strove very hard to keep up with when I was younger. He was the boy I most wanted to beat, catch, outplay and out smart. If he did 20 push ups I had to do 25 and if he punched me I would have to punch him harder. Often times fights wouldn't be resolved until someone ended up bleeding or crying. But things have changed, he got cured of coceties and even though there is still competitiveness between us it is much healthier and backed up with mutual respect and honesty.

For those of you who do not have support group, things are harder, but not impossible. Women who want to get ahead in life are often labeled "bitches" because the desire to succeed — to be someone, isn't feminine or desirable. In a society where beauty pageants and supermodels still rule the world, women are often held back by the double edge sword. My advice? Don't back down, take fencing lessons. Tara MK Connelly is a Collegian columnist.

Erik Molitor

It's been said over and over to our generation — to make our voices heard with our votes. Barrages of advertisements, huge registration drives, motor voter laws, even MTV has ordered us to vote. And I am about to tell you the same thing. We live in the greatest nation on the planet, one of the few where the people really do have the chance to affect their government, but too many of us take this privilege for granted. Too many of us don't understand just how important it is to get to the polls, just once every couple of years.

So why is it so important to vote? In this age of politics where candidates are indistinguishable from each other, relying on smear campaigns instead of debating real issues, what should give us the confidence in the system that would make us want to participate in it? I have asked myself this same question. The answer is simple — when we stop going to the polls, it sends a clear message to our government that we want them to rule us, because we are too stupid to get out there and do it for ourselves.

Young people are often the most enthusiastic and vocal about their ideals, yet the numbers for our voter turnouts are traditionally awful. As a result, the politicians don't listen to the questions we want answered, don't respond to the issues that matter to us. Think of it this way — if you were a politician that needed to balance a budget, you would make the cuts against the people that aren't going to vote for you anyway. For example, welfare is cut because poor people hardly ever vote. College aid is cut because students don't vote. Get the picture? Not voting directly affects many of the things that are important to you.

Many of you will tell me that there is no candidate you believe in enough to vote for, and I certainly can understand that. It is the unfortunate state of politics today — politicians simply play the game, pushing 'hot buttons' that can be reflected in 20 second sound bites on Headline News rather than truly debating the tough issues. There is no difference Democrats and Republicans. Both are motivated by the status quo. America could quite easily be moved to a new level of prosperity if we had a leader that could motivate us.

Think about this when you cast your vote. You are voting not just for a liberal or conservative platform, but also for the person that will be doing the leading. People will follow his example. We need a leader with moral integrity, rather than one who is plagued by constant scandals. We need a leader who, has been through the worst hand life could deal them, and overcome it with sheer willpower, rather than one who has dodged hardship and seeks the easy way out in all his decisions.

We need a leader who can give America an example it can follow proudly, a leader who will make us proud to be Americans, rather than shameful of his tarnished character or wishy–washy decision flopping.

You all know who it is that deserves to be our President. Who it is that should lead us into the next millennium, a millennium in which we can continue to grow as the strongest nation in the world, or crumble from within.

I encourage you to vote on Tuesday. You should have no excuses, and neither should the leader you vote for.

Nice to meet you, Mr. Apathy

Lisa M. Oliveri

It all started with a scream. A scary, bloodcurdling, horrifying scream. There was no mistaking it — it was not the wind, nor my overzealous imagination. It was pure and simple — a scream.

I was at home one evening, in my cozy townhouse in Sunderland, sitting on my bed reading about how Leni Riefenstahl, the great German film maker was a Nazi. It was well past 2 a.m. and I was planning on going to bed shortly. You probably could say I was at the least, content.

Until my housemate rushed into my room, interrupting my concentration, with a look of fear on her face. "I just heard a scream," she said to me, trembling. So naturally I asked the most obvious question, "Are you sure it wasn't an animal or the television?" She assured me that it wasn't. Curious as to what could be frightening my housemate, I got out of my bed to investigate.

At first I heard nothing, there was just utter silence from outdoors. We live in front of open fields and a row of bushes, I heard nothing but nature's pleasant night-time sounds. Then the silence was broken with the sound I will never forget. It was a human cry — no chance it could be an animal, and the scream was from terror not laughter. To me, an unsuspecting witness, it sounded as if the screamer was being tortured.

Now, I'm not sure everybody has experienced the above situation, so let's look at it hypothetically. What do you do? There's a vast array of choices.

First off, we live in an apartment complex, so there are plenty of other people who might have heard the same noises as we did. So we could have assumed someone else was going to take care of it and play Mr. Apathy. However, this seems to be the overwhelming choice of many in our society, to do nothing.

I read a story somewhere of a woman who was raped in the parking lot of her apartment complex while all the residents listened to her cries for help. No one called the police, tried to stop it or cared enough to do anything. These residents exemplified what is wrong with our society. Why is it bad to show a little concern?

Back when our parents were children, the world was a safer place. My Mom used to tell me of the days when she could leave her door open and unlocked for visitors, or when she and her friends could go dancing at night and not have to worry about who might follow them in the parking lot. Now there's a chance we might end up in a dumpster á la Christina Homer if we meet the wrong person in a bar.

So maybe the violence in our society is a problem that can't be changed overnight. Perhaps it has gotten so out of hand that we are unable to retrace the steps of our mislead path. But even if we live in a world of hate, we can still change our reactions to the violence which surrounds us. We can still show we care.

We need to get involved. There is no excuse in the world to not try and help someone in distress, especially since a call to the police is sometime all it takes.

My housemates and I placed two calls to the Sunderland police department that evening. It took about 30 seconds each time. We gave our apartment number, and spoke with the police briefly when they arrived to check out the scene. Is a few minutes out of your life too much to spare if it can save someone else's?

Fortunately, nobody was being attacked (we were hearing a noise from someone's computer) — but we at least made the effort to help. Don't be the one to sit on your couch and listen to a woman scream, thinking and hoping someone else will come to the rescue. Be the one that does try to rescue.

When is a minority not a minority?

Brian Schwartzman

The 1993–94 fact book put out by the University of Massachusetts Office of Institutional Research contains a breakdown on the percentage of Jewish students at the University. Calculating the number of Jewish students on this campus is nearly impossible because the state cannot legally demand for a student to identify his or her religion

For several reasons, determining the number of Jewish students on this campus becomes a speculative matter. An officer at the Hillel House has said the Jewish population is near 3,500, or approximately 20 percent of the student population. The Office of Jewish affairs has said there are no more than 1,200, or a 12 percent Jewish population. Not only does this raise statistical questions, but it raises issues concerning how one is defined as Jewish. Would a student with one parent who was Jewish, but was not in that percentage, or a student with two out of four grandparents? The question of what it means to be Jewish on a college campus continues to be one of self–identification.

In this respect, being Jewish is not much different from being a member of other minority groups. Terms like "Hispanic" or "Native American" also group together large and diverse groups of people and are not necessarily easily defined. What is troubling to some Jewish students, is when the term multicultural is limited to including students of color. This can give Jewish students the feeling of being a 12 percent minority on campus, yet not being included in the minority community.

This is largely the basis of students' concerns when Israel, and its right to exist, are challenged on this campus. Jewish students do not have a homogenous view towards Israel; some feel a deep connection with it, others are not so sure, and still others feel comfortable in their American environment and see no need to look beyond it.

It is the students who are still trying to find their focus, or their connection with Israel, who will be most affected by challenges on Israel's legitimacy. When the legitimacy of the statehood of Israel is challenged, the focus is removed from the issues of the present day and bogged down in ideological warfare.

There must be some way, at least on a college campus, to reach a common ground. Jewish students share something in common with students of color — they know what it's like to have their identity be made an issue when all they sought to do was live their life like a human being.

The University may be a difficult environment for a minority student, but it is still a place for individuals to reach toward self–discovery and groups toward finding a common ground.

Who will I be?

Brad Davidson

The time is near once again. The last day of October, the spookiest night of all, Halloween. Halloween was always a great night for my friends and I. When I was little I looked forward to the candy. When I was around 11, I looked forward to the pranks, and when I was a teenager I looked forward to the girls.

Remember when you were a kid and you knew what your outfit would be a month in advance. One year I was the Heat Meister, and another year I was the Pillsbury Doughboy. Now that I am in college, I don't really dress up anymore. In an attempt to get back my youth, this year I have decided to dress up and go on the hunt for bite size Milky Ways once again! There's just one problem though. Who will I be?

• Chancellor David K. Scott. I always wanted to be a chancellor of a big state university, so here is my chance. My costume will be simple. First I'll wear a grey suit with a conservative red tie. Then I'll take some baby powder and do my hair. I won't say "trick or treat," I'll just walk around aimlessly yelling "this is a land grant University." Instead of getting the candy myself, I'll pay some other people six figure salaries to get it for me.

• Marcus Camby. Besides the fact that I am under six feet tall, this outfit will not be too tough. I figure all I have to do is call up Mr. T and ask if I can borrow his jewelry collection.

• Martin Jones. After reading Mr. Jones articles for years, I have become his no. 1 fan. What better way to pay homage, then to dress up like him on Halloween? My costume will consist of three parts. First a Michael Jackson white diamond glove, second a "refuse to Lose" t–shirt signed by Coach Cal and lastly a big "Weld for President" sign.

• Security person at the University Store. This will be the easiest costume of all, although I don't want to be confused as a ghost. I'll just take a big white sheet and throw it over my head. I guess I could also be mistaken for a Klan member (hey, what's the difference?). If I drop any candy along the way, I'll just accuse someone of color of stealing it.

• Coach Cal. I always wanted to look like a gangster. I'll call up the costume department for Goodfellas and see if I can borrow a suit. When I ring doorbells, I won't say "trick or treat," I'll just take the candy and run!

• President Clinton. All I have to do is practice my Elvis impersonation and add a little whine to it. I'll walk around and act like I've done a great job for the last four years simply because some other kid is dressed up as Bob Dole who's never done anything.

Well, as you can see I have a very tough decision ahead of me. There are just so many good choices. In the end I'll probably give in to my childhood fantasy and be "Rudy" from the "Far Albert" cartoon or Richard Simmons. Happy Halloween!

Reality check

Alytheia Laughlin

In the waning months of the summer, my excitement at the prospect of finally entering my senior year overwhelmed me. I looked forward to being at the top of the heap. I looked forward to slacking off and partying. I was a very disillusioned person. So far, being a senior isn't all that it's cracked up to be. I was naive in thinking that this year would be the time of my life.

Many of my fellow classmates and I have discussed the prospect of graduation at length, and the general feeling is one of confusion. Here we are six months away from entering the "real world," and for most of us the only understanding of the "Real World," is that crappy MTV show.

One of the main factors that is bringing many of the seniors down, as well a myself, is boredom. After spending almost four years at this fine institution there is rarely anything that surprises or shocks me. My feeling is, "been there, done that." Most of us have completed our general education requirements and are near finishing major requirements. What's being taught to us in the classroom, is just regurgitating things that have already been learned. And really, how many times can you endure go town or an off–campus party before the thrill of it all starts to wear off.

There will be those who read this and think that they have it all together, and they aren't confused. Stop kidding yourself! The blow is only going to be that much harder come May. The truth of the matter is that it's scary to think about leaving this safe haven of college, despite the fact that many of us are bored with it.

The class of 1997 is bombarded with the negative rhetoric of the media that claims there are little or no job opportunities available for college graduates. Added to that burden, is the insecurities many of us have about being competent in the field that we choose. Let me give you an example.

In the middle of my sophomore year I added journaiism to my anthropology major. Everyone I spoke with told me that unless I had a doctorate degree in anthropology, my chances of really getting to study foreign cultures were slim to none. Since I have always had a passion for writing, I thought that I would combine the two majors and hopefully get a chance to work for National Geographic when I graduate. Recently a friend in journalism told me that unless I'm God, I'd better forget National Geographic. If I wasn't already plagued with self–doubt as to my abilities as a writer, I certainly am now.

Forgive me, I don't want to sound too pessimistic. The confusion, boredom, despair and fear that many seniors feel now, will eventually pass. It is part of the transition of becoming an "adult". Most of us who graduate will get jobs, and hopefully someday become successful. However for those of you who suffer from senioritious as I do, just wanted to let you know your not alone.

Supporting immigration

John Wilkinson

How many times have you seen stories about immigration on the evening news lately? How many times have politicians called for a moratorium on immigration, to the applause of cheering crowds of American workers? How many times has Bill Clinton promised to appoint a commission to "study the problem" and make recommendations on how to solve "the immigrant problem?"

The answer to all of these questions is "too often." Politicians are either opposed to immigration on the grounds that we can't afford it, or support immigration on the basis that it is America's responsibility to provide for the world's poor. Why does no one seem to support immigration for the best of all reasons, that it is good for America? Immigration helps improve the lot of every last American worker, and the country as a whole.

Numerous stories on "Dateline" and "20/20" depict unskilled, non–English speaking immigrants stealing jobs from natives and placing impossible burdens on social services such as public education, social security and welfare. Stories like these cause many citizens and politicians to react to what they perceive to be a "flood" of immigrants. Contrary to this perception, however, immigration is not a problem, but a solution to many of our nation's dilemmas. In fact, America has a lot to gain by greatly increasing immigration, and we should do so at the earliest possible opportunity.

Anti–immigration groups such as the Federation for American Immigration Reform (FAIR), falsely claim that immigration to the United States is at record levels. That there are simply too many immigrants entering the country too quickly is a common sentiment among even college– educated U.S. citizens. The numbers and the facts of immigration, however, do not support this view. The current yearly rate of immigration into this country is about 750,000. This compares with nearly a million immigrants who entered the U.S. annually during the first decade of this century when the native population was much smaller.

Furthermore, the percentage of the U.S. population that was foreign born is less than one–half of what it was during that early part of the century — six percent now compared to nearly 15 percent then. We like to think of ourselves as a nation of immigrants, but we are really a nation of the descendants of immigrants. How many people do you know who like to think of themselves as Irish, Polish or Italian, and how many of them were really born in those countries? If America could sustain a 15 percent immigrant population at the turn of the century when we were a relatively poor nation of farmers, we can certainly do so now that we are a wealthy nation of engineers and computer programmers.

The main argument against immigration is the supposed threat that uneducated, unskilled immigrants pose to native workers already disadvantaged by their own lack of education and job skills. This is rarely the case, though, as employers in industries from fast food to laundries to lawn care say that they have to hire immigrants because natives refuse to work these jobs. No study, even those sponsored by groups like FAIR, has ever shown that legal or illegal immigrants increase unemployment for native born U.S. citizens.

Even if immigration did increase unemployment for low– skilled native workers, the problem would be easy to solve. Currently, about 80 percent of immigrants are admitted into this country on the basis of extended familial relations, i.e., they have a brother, uncle, cousin or in–law living in this country. If these 80 percent of immigrants were instead admitted on the basis of skill, not only would we have a fairer system, but we would also squelch fears that unskilled immigrants are putting Americans out of work.

The most important benefit of increased immigration though, is its ability to give the U.S. a competitive advantage that no other country enjoys. The vast majority of highly educated emigrants from other countries either went to school in the United States or want to immigrate to the United States. No other country has the same appeal that the United States has. We in America should be using this appeal to our utmost advantage to attract the kind of talented, productive people who will give us an edge in 21st century global competition.

For those of us who worry about competition for high– wage jobs when we graduate college, it is useful to realize that we have two options: 1) work with highly skilled immigrants when they come to the United States or 2) compete against them when they go to Canada or Australia — two countries that have been dramatically increasing citizenship offers to skilled immigrants, and have seen productivity boosts as a result.

A larger number of immigrants with high wage jobs means more taxes can be collected and more money can be made available for programs that provide for the elderly, support public education and help disadvantaged native workers with job skills retraining. Immigration doesn't just grow our population as some critics seem to think, it grows our economy, increases our productivity and has benefits for all members of society.

Cave men get lost

Amy Lounsbury

She felt his eyes boring a hole through her back.

"Can I help you with something?" my friend asked as she turned to face the man who refused to stop staring at her.

"Uh, sorry... my friends over there were giving me a hard time," he answered with slurred speech. I'm sorry, but this is no excuse to stare relentlessly at someone who is sitting five inches from you. This was the scene one recent Saturday night at a local bar.

What I can't understand is why guys have to be such pigs. Don't get me wrong, I know that not all men feel they have to make rude comments to everyone who walks by in a skirt. I happen to know a lot of great guys who do respect women. But I was totally appalled at the behavior I witnessed uptown.

Two of my female friends and I had decided to have a girls' night out. Forget the guys. Who needs them to have a good time? Unfortunately, maybe we did. As we sat in the first bar, older men (alumni weekend is not the best time to go out) kept staring and trying to impress us. Basically they just acted like fools. "What year are you?... Oh, I was a senior once." That's good to know. Thanks for sharing that with us.

The next bar was a zoo. There were wall to wall drunk people, many of them guys making rude comments. One of my friends was even grabbed. Needless to say, we left there pretty quickly.

As we walked down the street to the last bar, a group of guys stared us down. "You guys are all hot," one of them said as we passed by. Uh... thanks. You sound like an idiot. What is the point of acting like this? It is certainly not the way to impress anyone. Not that a long–term relationship is what any of these guys is after.

What frustrates me is that women have fought so hard to become equal, but there are still so many men that treat them like sex objects. What's worse is that some women may actually enjoy this attention. I would hope that no one actually realizes that this attention is a good thing, a reflection of their attractiveness and self–worth.

I have also noticed that when uptown in mixed company we have no problems. It is sad to think that we might need to have guys with us to avoid harassment. I'd like to think that we can go wherever we want without needing them for protection. As long as we cover each other's backs, there is no danger to us, but the comments are downright degrading. I do not enjoy walking around town watching drunk college guys assert their manliness by trying to act superior to every female in sight.

If someone makes a degrading comment to me, I have the urge to say "Screw you, buddy," but I always choose to ignore it and walk on by. Then you get called a bitch. Maybe they think women who ignore their comments are rude, but it really is not worth the attention to show that you care. Remember, if you don't let them see that it bothers you, they won't be as tempted to come back with more.

I just wish that I could understand this behavior. These are not the dark ages. By day, I take classes where guys say that women are equal and should not be discriminated against. By night, I have realized that so many people our age still have outdated views about women.

Sure, we have come a long way in this country over the years. Women are holding positions once held solely by men, women have gained equality in many respects.

What bothers me the most is that it is my generation acting this way. We need to make changes now so that women really can gain equality. I'm not asking for world peace. I'm not trying to cure all the ills in this world. I just want a little respect. Is that too much to ask?

Letters to the Editor

Collegian coverage praised

To the editor:

Congratulations on your comprehensive coverage of campaign UMass and the editorial "Supporting our future." I want to thank the many students, faculty, staff and alumni who were involved in making the Campaign kick–off events so successful.

Working together we can accomplish all of our goals and more for the benefit of current and future students, as well as the broader University community.

We look forward to an annual October festival renewing our commitment to the campaign that, as Professor Julius Lester said at the kick off dinner, is no less than "a visionary undertaking whose ultimate goal is to increase and enhance the University's contribution to the intellectual, political, economic cultural and social life of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts."

UMass is indeed on the move and deserving of support.

Royster Hedgepeth
Vice Chancellor for University Advancement

GEO expresses gratitude

To the editor:

Thank you to all of the members of the GEO and the UMass community who turned out to our union's demonstration last Friday, Oct. 25. Special thanks go out to the Collegian and reporter Jonathan Liberty for providing excellent coverage of the event for those members who could not attend. Time will tell whether or not our presence outside and inside of Whitmore will make a difference. One thing is for sure — the Graduate Employee Organization is rising again.

This is an exciting time to be a union member. For the first time in over a generation, the American labor movement is beginning to get up off its knees and fight back against corporate giants and their willing allies in the U.S. government. Here at GEO, members are beginning to see the importance of their union again and are willing to make their support known to the administration and the larger University community like they did last Friday. Even if the demonstration does not force the administration to bow to our demands, it shows our members and supporters that the union is willing to stand up and fight for our rights.

GEO has agreed not to discuss the details of the negotiations with the press. This is always a fine line to walk when the union is trying to communicate with over 2,000 members on the UMass campus. The issues that GEO are fighting for however go beyond the intimate details of negotiations. Increased access to the Univer–ity, a living wage, job security, better health care and adequate child care are issues we would rally around, whether we were in contract negotiations or not. We ask that everyone in the UMass community see our demands not as just another union contract asking for more, more and more, but as an attempt to keep the University honest about its mission, to serve poor and working people.

Patrick Crowley
GEO President

Monkees actually sing on comeback album

The Heads can't cut it, Dando goes a little crazy & House of Pain solid hip–hop

MEDESKI, MARTIN AND WOOD
Shack–Man
Rykodisc/Grammavision

Half a month after their sold–out show at the Northampton Center For The Arts show (sponsored by the Iron Horse, but put on at the NCFTA because of that venue's dance floors space), John Medeski, Billy Martin and Chris Wood are on record store shelves again with their recent album, Shack–Man, recorded at "The Shack," the trio's Hawaii recording studio.

A very intimate sound is evident in all the songs on this album. Everything sounds clean and pure, with low use of effects and tricks. The only problem with the mix, and quite an important problem, is that Wood's virtuosi bass abilities end up being buried under Medeski's keyboards, which this album is most prominently focused upon.

Nevertheless, as groove was the fuel moving the crowd at the Sept. 27 show, it moves this disc from song to funk/soul–jazz song. "Is There Anybody Here That Love My Jesus?" is the opener and has a slow funk feel, with Medeski switching between organ and clavinet. "Bubblehouse," with the tempo of its pumping theme gradually gaining speed, was a winner at the show, and is equally so on this CD. "Lifeblood" prominently features Martin for the first time showing off his sublime percussive abilities, however it comes quite late in the disc. Martin's technique is also spotlighted in the song after that, "Jelly Belly."

Wood does have some featured moments on this disc, like his acoustic solo on "Think" (another September show hit), and the bass line of "Stance of The Spirit Red Gator," but he's not as audible or as large a part of the chemistry as he was in concert.

The best song is probably "Night Marchers," with the Martin and Wood rhythm section ripping out some searing hip–hop/funk backing energy to Medeski's switch between Hammond organ and a clavinet on wah–wah. That clav on wah–wah sound's staccato bite was also featured in September.

Shack–Man is a pleasant, yet killer, hybrid of soul, jazz and hip–hop styles grounded in deep, sweaty funk. The energy of the trio's heralded live performance, which also thrilled the Iron Horse proper in the spring of this year, is well represented on disc.

THE MONKEES
Justus
Rhino

"Here they come, walkin' down the street... again." Yes, the Monkees are back — and they've got something to prove. After 30 years of being maligned, slighted and ridiculed, the laughing-stocks of '60s rock have returned with a vengeance.

With guitarist Mike Nesmith back in the fold (he'd wisely avoided previous reunion projects — all of which were blatant attempts to cash in on nostalgia), the reconstituted Monkees have delivered and are seeking Justus.

Justus marks the first time the Monkees have ever recorded an album entirely by themselves. Contrary to popular myth, they did perform on their '60s product, though usually augmented by session musicians and the premier producers of the day. Also, some of the best pop songs of the decade were handed to them.

Performed, produced, and written entirely by the band, the Monkees rise to the challenge quite admirably, considering that they were, after all, originally actors hired to play the roles of a fictional rock band.

Kicking off with a remake of their garage–rock classic "Circle Sky," Justus asserts itself immediately. Micky Dolenz's surprisingly powerful drumming and singing, Nesmith's muscular guitar riffing and Peter Tork's bass and keyboard work (not to mention Davy Jones's masterful tambourine) propel the album with an energy and abandon rarely associated with the Monkees.

Also, the lyrics have as much bite as the music. All four have recently been divorced, and their anger shows. Such tracks as "Never Enough" and "Regional Girl" rock convincingly and "Admiral Mike" even takes a swipe at the values of the media. "Daydream Believer, Pt. II" this ain't.

Unfortunately, though, the band can't maintain such intensity and quality for the duration of the album. The jangly Monkee twang of old has been replaced by a fairly generic, slightly '80's rock sound. The quality of the songs themselves is also inconsistent, ranging from the slightly boring to the utterly embarrassing. Yet, the sense of fun and purpose the Monkees felt while recording this is infectious, and far more genuine than the contrived "reunion" songs issued last year by the Beatles.

Justus won't win the Monkees very many new fans, but it's definitely good enough to keep the old ones happy. C+ (John Hendrickson)

GO SAILOR
Go Sailor
Lookout!

Oh, Rose Melberg. Few indie pop fans can argue her status as the queen of American pop. Since her days with the legendary Tiger Trap to her current work with the Softies and Go Sailor, Melberg has been charming her fans with her innocent songwriting and vocal delivery for years.

Last year the Softies released the beautiful album It's Love. While the album ranks up with the year's best, it laid back approach was a far cry from Tiger Trap's days of revved up pop hits.

Enter Go Sailor. Over the past two years the band recorded three excellent seven–inch singles on Yo–Yo, Slumberland and Lookout! This new CD compiles the three slabs of vinyl and adds two slightly more obscure compilation tracks.

While the album features no new material, it is a delightful album perfectly suited for dorm room dancing.

Songs like "Fine Day For Sailing," "Blue Sky" and "The Boy Who Sailed Around the World" capture the band at it's brightest. Few artists can write a simple pop song like Melberg — the amazing thing is, that she hasn't missed the mark yet.

Go Sailor is just Melberg's latest project warming the hearts of pop fans everywhere. In a day when sub–par bands like Velocity Girl, Fuzzy and Weezer clutter the airwaves, bands like

Lost Poets create no nonsense style

By Daniel Bodah
Collegian Staff

It looked like a room where corporate bigwigs would confer and explain pie charts and profit flow diagrams to each other. There was a quiet, officious feel to the space. But when Last Poets Umar Bin Hassan and Abiodun Oyewole chanted and ranted their poems over the skilled drumming of Don Babatunde in the Campus Center at Amherst College Monday night, it was a think-tank of a decidedly different nature.

They started the night with a plea to their mostly young, collegiate audience to be careful — careful of the pretty, comfortable environment at this college named after a man who exterminated Native Americans. This is, they say, exactly the kind of place where your mind can die if you don't watch out. In this no-nonsense style, the two crafted a performance that was simultaneously casual and powerful.

Taking the time to talk at length with the audience between songs, the two poets kept up a steady stream of ideas and commentary, often eliciting cheerful agreement from the 50 or so attendees. Abiodun talked about teaching, insisting that it is a hands-on job. We're being ripped off, he says, unless our teachers are taking the time to know us all individually. Umar talked about criticisms the band has received for allegedly homophobic lines, and also spoke about the use the band makes of the word "nigger."

But ultimately it was the poems everyone was there to hear. Umar and Abiodun make a great pair: Umar's unsparingly critical, inward gaze dissects the mental world of African American experience as he sees it, while Abiodun counterbalances with his focus on the beauty and strength of his people.

Abiodun explained that although he doesn't like wearing shirts with bowties and so isn't a member of the Nation of Islam, he is strongly behind the work Louis Farrakhan is doing — especially such actions as the Million Man March. For him the March represents a positive light in the African American community, mirroring an idea that the Poets repeated again and again: if you give out positivity and love, people will give it back to you. Abiodun's imagery is rich with references to the physical beauty, cultural accomplishments, and human warmth of African Americans. He's working hard at counteracting the effect that over a century and a half of slavery have had on the African American

Meridian Arts Ensemble brings own style to Bowker

By Seema Gangatirkar
Collegian Staff

When it comes to describing the Meridian Arts Ensemble, predictable is hardly the word that first springs to mind. Rather, this brass ensemble pays homage to some of the greatest composers of the classical era and then moves on to other, more modern influences, like Frank Zappa.

Known for its innovative style, MAE has managed to transcend six centuries of musical styles to come up with an unusual program. Some notable names found on MAE's programs include Scarlatti, Bach and Hindemith. Nor should it come as a surprise that this ensemble throws in a bit of jazz fusion, ska, Afro–Cuban and Calypso styles. Examples of some of the songs MAE has been known to play are "Moo Shu Rap Wrap" by Su Lian Tan and Zappa's "King Kong." In addition, the performers compose their own pieces, such as "MAE we Strut/Crunch" by John Ferrari.

The Meridian Arts Ensemble sprang into existence in 1987 at the Julliard School. It wasn't long before people began to notice this innovative group and was hailed as "fire and brilliance" by the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

In 1990, MAE walked away with first prize in the Concert Artists Guild New York Competition. In 1994, the ensemble captured the Chamber Music America/ASCAP Award for Adventurous Programming.

The quintet is composed of trumpeters Richard Kelley and Jon Nelson, hornist Daniel Grabois, trombonist Benjamin Herrington, tubist Raymond Steward and tonight's performance will feature special percussionist Ferrari.

MAE teamed up with Zappa to develop his pieces for their repertory. Zappa's feelings about the band are eloquently stated when he said, "Go see them. They're excellent." In time, Zappa's enthusiasm for the group grew to such proportions that when he was sick, MAE came to play for him. In fact, it is thought that the Meridian Arts Ensemble is the last band Zappa heard before his death in 1993.

Last August, MAE released its fourth CD, Prime Meridian, featuring more of Zappa's music. Other composers include Captain Beefheart and Milton Babbit. MAE's previous CD, Smart Went Crazy, spotlighted Jimmy Hendrix and Stravinsky.

MAE has performed all over the United States. MAE has been hosted by Carnegie Hall, Chicago's Symphony Hall and the Cleveland Museum of Art.

In addition, MAE has racked up the frequent flyer miles, making performances all over the world. In the past MAE has visited Japan, Columbia, Austria, Holland and Germany.

MAE has also made plenty of television appearances, including PBS' "Live from Lincoln Center" and international appearances on German, Dutch and Austrian state networks.

The Meridian Arts Ensemble will perform tonight at 8 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium. Tickets are $20 and $15. Under age 17, tickets are $8 and Five College Students are $5. For more information, please call the Box Office at 545–2511 or (800) 999–UMAS.

Get ready to duck down to the realm of Bucktown

By Chris Maher
Collegian correspondent

If you are not familiar with the BootCamp Clik it's composed of The Cocoa Brovaz (formerly Smif–N–Wessun), Heltah Skeltah and The Originoo Gunn Clappaz. The Clik was introduced due to the success of Black Moon who blew open a new style in '93 and put their boys on one by one.

If you were lucky and around here in Spring '94 you caught one of Smif–N–Wessun's very first shows when they opened for Black Moon at Hampshire College. They were stage amateurs, but brought the aura of true veterans. They were live, excited and they entertained bringing the true essence of hip hop to the Third Dimension. Few of today's new acts can claim the same, showing and proving their reality. "I am what I am and I do what I do/ Puff mad lie, catch wreck with my crew."

Heltah Skeltah will try and make you, "understand that Heltah Skeltah only means war. The wars with everything outside your door." So we all need "Therapy" of some sort even though we all have different doors acting as the entrance to our personal warzone.

Originoo Gunn Clappaz will remind us that, "Fab Five's mad live blow up the spot, Dru Ha' gets the paper Black Moon still gets the props." So if heads roll through unprepared for the weather they are going to get blown over by Da Storm.

There is but one thing with the ability to cease the fire that flames from the mouths of these hardcore fanatics — the Pioneer Valley's infamous lackluster hip hop crowds. They tend to catch the gust of enthusiasm five minutes before the finale and complain it was too short. Be forewarned to come ready: the entire show will last 80 minutes unless they are inspired to play longer.

Not to worry though for a great event will deplete your vigor if the show can't. We will be blessed by world renown mix tape DJ/producer Ron G. He's been getting love on tape since '91 when he caught props from Q–Tip. He will spin the intermissions and then a dance party following the shows end until 2 a.m.

So be wise, forget your financial responsibilities for now and represent with 12 beans today for the cost is $14 tomorrow. Don't stress costumes, there should be plenty of characters there. The theme of the night is Timbo's and fatigues best dressed soldier gets backstage (if he's slick).

The Boot Campclik and Ron G. performs at the Student Union Ballroom tomorrow night. Doors open at 8 p.m., show starts at 8:30 p.m. Advance tickets are $12 students, $13 non–students; $14 day of show.

Moan and groan everyday about the Collegian or get off your fat tiinny and do something about it? If something isn't being covered or is being ignored, come and tell us - the worst we can do is feed you to the lions. ROAR!

Go Sailor is that much more needed to prove that the pop song isn't dead. Go Sailor performs at the Prescott Tavern at Hampshire College Nov. 12 A– (Mike Burke)

LEMONHEADS
Car Button Cloth
TAG/Atlantic

Let's get this out of the way: yes, Evan Dando might be considered to some people attractive and if you read any of the other reviews on this album, you'll find this comment irrelevantly uttered over and over.

But with this album you'll find Dando not only attractive sounding, but also deliciously deranged and creatively crooked. The seventh full length LP by the Lemonheads fronted by Dando goes off the mark and wanders like a child into a world full of questions and confusion.

Fresh out of the studio after a six year hiatus (not counting EPs or songbooks), Car Button Cloth is full of lush pop tunes that Dando knows how to spin. However these tunes are littered with enough awkward noise to make it more than just a sticky cotton candy delight. This baby's got substance and what might at first melt in your mouth will stay stuck in your head.

Carrying the image of an autistic child throughout the album (from cover to liner notes) Dando dabbles in and out of half-truth and maybe's with songs like "It's All True" and "C'mon Daddy." Like Madonna, he also tells a few twisted bedtimes stories with "Hospital" and "Six." Skipping along with Dando is a variety of garden grown singers like Eugene Kelley, Bill Gibson and John Strohm. They all add a little extra spice that complements his demented stew but in no way detracts from his original flavor as heard in "If I Could Talk I'd Tell You" and "Tenderfoot" making Car Button Cloth is a tasty treat that's hard to beat. B+ (Tara MK Connelly)

BRENDAN BENSON
One Mississippi
Virgin Records

Whoever signed Brendan Benson deserves a raise, a paid vacation and a big tall glass of chocolate milk. One Mississippi is exactly the kind of pop album you don't hear much of anymore — imaginative, clever, overwhelmingly catchy and steeped in tradition without being too derivative.

The album starts with "Tea," a song that could easily pass for a great lost Kinks' song. Short, sweet and to the point, "Tea" segues into "Bird's Eye View," a rollicking pop blast with shimmering vocals and hiccuping guitars. The whole album rolls along at this pace — one perfect little pop gem after another.

The key to Benson's success on One Mississippi is his ability to hop from style to style without sacrificing the substance of the songs, or the flow of the album. The production has punch without being repetitive and draws on the full vocabulary of pop rock sounds. Benson can roll from Zombies style harmonies to Buzzcocks style sparks without blinking an eye, and still keep his Alex Chilton wink and Scott Miller smarts intact.

Dropping names doesn't do him much justice, however. Benson's individual artistic voice is clearly defined throughout — a debut album confident and glowing with both Benson's individual stamp, and the spirit of pop's greatest tunesmiths. B+ (Bradley Skaught)

THE HEADS
No Talking, Just Head
MCA/ Radioactive

Don't bother. This one doesn't even look good on paper. The Talking Heads without David Byrne and a handful of guest musicians make an album as The Heads. David Byrne dropped the lawsuit against these guys — maybe he heard the album and realized it wasn't worth it.

Co-writing all the songs with their special guests (except for Debbie Harry,) The Heads prove themselves to be a very bland and tired sounding backing band. The first song, "Damage I've Done" with Johnette Napolitano, is a perfect example of how lukewarm the album can be. Napolitano is typically over the top, her voice a gut busting force of nature, but The Heads don't seem to notice. It's one of the coldest, least interactive duets since Sinatra's lifeless Duets albums a couple years back.

A lot of the damage done here would be forgivable if the songwriting were tighter, but the good songwriters (like Andy Partridge and Maria McKee) aren't given much to work with, and the less interesting songwriters (like Michael Hutchence and Gavin Friday) aren't even given the benefit of an exciting musical backdrop.

No Talking, Just Head is a throwaway — a lifeless album that doesn't do an inch of justice to The Talking Heads legacy, or to some of the great names who lend their voices to this uninteresting product. D (B.S.)

HOUSE OF PAIN
Truth Crushed To Earth Shall Rise Again
Tommy Boy

Huh? What happened? Rewind. Is this the same House Of Pain that blew the scene up with "Jump Around"? Is this the same House Of Pain that rhymed about "Shamrocks and Shenanigans"? Clearly not.

House Of Pain have done a lot of growing up since their last album, and albeit shocking it's a nice change. You've still got Everlast's gruff vocals but this time he's rhyming about the hip–hop game in a style more reminiscent of KRS– One or De La Soul.

"I'm fed up time to go head huntin', to many crews be frontin', get up I break it down a little somethin'," from "Fed Up."

The beats on the album, courtesy of DJ Muggs are slamming. He uses sparse beats, reminiscent of the first Jeru album, and mixes them in with some eerie spooky stuff like the Gravediggaz. The result is a perfect setting for the more sinister attack House Of Pain has adopted.

"Heart Full Of Sorrow" featuring Sadat X is reminiscent of Tribe's "The Business" and is one of the standout tracks. The "Fed Up" remix featuring Guru is probably the best song, as Guru's vocal dexterity and smooth delivery provide the perfect contrast for Everlast's gruff approach. The song also exemplifies where H.O.P. falls short. While Everlast can hold his own lyrically, his voice brings images of barroom brawls to your mind, not bedroom Casanova's or spiritual leaders.

This is a good album that should establish House Of Pain as a solid hip–hop crew, not just a hip–pop one. While they do fall short in places when they're on, and they mostly are on this album, they can hold their own with the best of them. Fans of Jeru, Nas and even De La Soul or Tribe Called Quest should check this out. B (Adam Dlugacz)

Suzanne Vega brings mix of folk & spirit to Noho

The Heads flop on their latest release.

COURTESY FRANK OCKENFELS

By Lisa M. Oliveri
Collegian Staff

Suzanne Vega is herald as one of the greatest female songwriters in this decade. Her musical career has spanned a decade, and she has not only garnered critical acclaim for her solo work, but for side projects as well. Tomorrow night Vega brings her sprightly vocals to Northampton.

Raised in New York Spanish Harlem and Upper East Side, Vega was privy to many various influences during her childhood. Her stepfather was a Puerto Rican writer, so musically, multi–international artists were an integral part of Vega's upbringing. She cites Astrud Gilberto as her biggest singing influence, but also admits the she loved the Beatles, Pete Seeger and Santana.

A prodigy in the making, Vega studied dance at the High School of Performing Arts before attending Barnard College for literature. At night, Vega performed at small clubs, niching for herself a spot in folk music.

Though Vega released a strong debut, 1985's Suzanne Vega, she did not have mainstream success until two years later. Solitude Standing gave the world Vega's chilling No. 1 single, "Luka." From then on, Vega kept racking up more acclaim and more fans.

Vega has embraced many different types of music during her career, each of her albums shows a different side. On Days of Open Hand Vega combined acoustics with industrial textures, and 1992's 99.9F° leaned more towards a techno side. On Nine Objects of Desire, Vega continues to progress, singing intimate songs of heartfelt desire.

Along the road of success, Vega embarked on various side projects, working with acclaimed artists like Philip Glass, Joe Jackson, They Might Be Giants and the Lemonheads. She has also been featured on the Grateful Dead tribute album Deadicated, on the soundtracks to Dead Man Walking and The Truth About Cats and Dogs and contributed to a Disney compilation.

Vega continues to excite fans and critics alike with her intricate blend of funky styles. Tonight she will entertains the Valley along with Jason Faulkner.

Suzanne Vega plays tonight at the Academy of Music in Northampton at 8 p.m. Call 586–8686 for tickets.

Umar creates incredibly vivid maps of the mind with streams of crazy, lush, psychedelic images. His commentary focuses on pointing out the inner workings of poor self– esteem, addiction, and other ailments. A number of audience members knew exactly what he was talking about: they responded throughout his incisive screens with raised hands, nodding heads and laughter. Near the end of the performance Umar did "This is Madness," a wild piece in which he screams and rants his way through cascades of politically relevant images, and for which he received lengthy applause.

The trio ended their evening with the hope that we would all be inspired to think by their performance. To a request from the front row, they each did a love poem as well, ending the night upbeat and light.

For those who missed seeing this important band, they have an album, Mouth Almighty, coming out in the spring. Check it out and see that these older carriers of the revolutionary torch are still very much alive and strong in spirit

NY celebrates championship

By Jim Fitzgerald
Associated Press

NEW YORK — An overflow crowd of New York Yankees fans released 18 years worth of frustration yesterday in a pinstriped party that stretched from the House that Ruth Built to the Canyon of Heroes.

The crowd was a mix of Little Leaguers and Wall Streeters, die-hard fans and bandwagon-jumpers. Virtually all were decked out in Yankee blue or pinstripes, turning lower Manhattan into an enormous blue and white pep rally.

Mayor Rudolph Giuliani announced 3.5 million people attended the city's "biggest and grandest parade" ever, an unlikely estimate based more on civic pride than reality.

Numbers aside, it was a second chance for fans, many shut out of scarce World Series seats, to celebrate with players who enjoyed a season of second chances — injured pitchers Jimmy Key and David Cone, recovering addicts Darryl Strawberry and Dwight Gooden, manager Joe Torre.

"No way I would work today," shouted Pauline Frawley, a Queens nurse who played hooky. "I just wanted to experience the excitement of it. The buzz. It's absolutely fantastic."

When the parade left Battery Park shortly after 11:30 a.m. under sunny skies and temperatures in the '50s, a howl of triumph echoed for blocks uptown.

As the procession rode up Broadway, thick clouds of paper floated down onto the route traveled by past heroes from Charles Lindbergh to Nelson Mandela.

Cheers of "Let's go Yankees" boomed off concrete walls, and people scaled trees and hung from skyscraper windows for a glimpse of the players who ended the longest World Series drought in Yankees' history.

The players returned the attention. Cigar-smoking Cecil Fielder, who escaped the last-place Detroit Tigers earlier this season, aimed his video-camera at the screaming masses.

The shower of ticker tape — actually shredded phone books, computer printouts and toilet paper — gave way to a City Hall celebration, where each of the team members received a key to the city.

Torre and Wade Boggs told the crowd they had never seen anything like the parade marking the first Yankees' title since 1978. "That was the greatest sports spectacle in history," said Boggs, who was given a mounted police officer's helmet by police commissioner Howard Safir in tribute to the third baseman's horse ride through the outfield after the Yankees' victory.

"I've never been involved in anything close to this parade, this mass of humanity," said Torre, who was fired last season by the St. Louis Cardinals. "This is absolutely spectacular."

Earlier in the day, Torre rang the opening bell at the New York Stock Exchange. He appeared on a balcony with NYSE chairman Richard Grasso to ring the bell for the 9:30 a.m. start of trading. Torre then waved and gave the thumbs-up sign amid cheers and a flurry of baseballs and caps.

"The harder you work, the luckier you get," Torre said. "... As far as I'm concerned, I'm the luckiest guy in the world."

Tommy Morrison to fight Sat. in Japan

By Ed Schuyler, Jr.
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Anthony Cooks told his girlfriend that he will fight Tommy Morrison, the HIV-infected heavyweight, Sunday in Japan.

"She just told me to be careful, and she would pray for me," Cooks said. "Hopefully, nothing will happen."

Frank Garza told his estranged wife he had the assignment to referee the bout, a preliminary to the George Foreman-Crawford Grimsley fight, and she replied, "Congratulations, you got what you wanted."

"I don't know what she meant by that," Garza said. "I don't mean to be sarcastic."

The two men participated in a conference call Tuesday before leaving for Japan and the show that will be seen Saturday night in the United States on pay-per-view.

The 44-year-old Garza, of Detroit, saw his participation as a chance to promote AIDS awareness.

Cooks has a simple reason for taking the fight.

"A lot of people have been saying I'm crazy to fight, but I need the fight, I need the money," said the 31-year-old Cooks, of Mukogee, Okla.

Cooks wouldn't disclose his purse, but said it would be more than his biggest payday to date, the $15,000 he got when he was stopped by David Tua in the first round July 21.

While Cooks said he never had been cut, Morrison has. He bled badly when he was stopped by Lennox Lewis in the sixth round Oct. 7, 1995 in what was his last fight before he announced his retirement because of HIV.

"I have no fear with proper protection and proper procedures," said Garza, who planned to would wear latex gloves and would discuss the possibility of wearing goggles. Boxers can't wear goggles.

Garza said he is a former member of the Michigan boxing commission and has attended several boxing seminars concerning AIDS.

"There has never been a documented case of boxer transmitting HIV to another boxer," said Garza, who let it be known that he would like to referee Morrison's comeback when the former heavyweight contender announced he would fight again.

"Tommy had said he would donate his purse for AIDS research, and I said I would like to referee and I would give my purse to AIDS research," said Garza, who estimated he has worked more than 100 pro bouts in over 10 years.

Cooks said his pay was still to be negotiated.

Cooks, who served 18 months in prison about 18 months ago for receiving stolen property, said his record is 11-5.

Who's afraid of the big Black Bears?

Jeff Smith and the Massachusetts football team look to rebound this weekend when the University of Maine's Black Bears come to McGuirk Stadium. Game time is 12:30 pm.

Nets cut Bright

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. (AP) — The New Jersey Nets waived two rookie free agents to cut their roster to 14, the team said yesterday.

Cut from the team were Donta Bright and William Cunningham, both of whom were signed just three days before the Nets began their pre-season training camp Oct. 1.

Bright, a 6-foot-6 forward who played under Nets coach John Calipari at Massachusetts, averaged five points in four pre-season games. He also had six rebounds and six assists in 39 minutes of action.

Bright appeared in a pre-season exhibition game with the Nets in Amherst when the Nets played the Washington Bullets on Oct. 13. He scored eight points on three-for-seven shooting, including a three pointer. He was one-for- two from the line in 20 minutes of action. Bright also garnered two rebounds, both defensive.

Cunningham, a 6-11 center from Temple, appeared in three pre-season games and averaged 1.3 points. He also had four rebounds and one block in 17 minutes of play.

He scored two points in five minutes of action during the Nets pre-season game with Washington.

TORONTO (AP) — Former University of Massachusetts star Marcus Camby has a slightly sprained and bruised left ankle but is not expected to miss the Toronto Raptors' NBA season opener.

The team said Monday that X-rays on the foot, injured in Sunday's 80-77 loss to the Vancouver Grizzlies, showed no serious damage. He is expected to play in the regular-season opener Friday at the SkyDome against the New York Knicks.

Camby was injured in the third quarter when he fell after making a layup on an alley-oop pass from teammate Damon Stoudamire. The Raptors also said forward Carlos Rogers, who did not play at all in the pre-season after injury his back in a fall during a scrimmage, is expected to be available Friday night. The 6-foot-11 forward practiced Monday at full speed.

For Camby, it was his second ankle injury of the pre- season. He hurt his right ankle early in training camp and missed about a week of practice.

"Marcus is going to be a great player in this league," coach Darrell Walker said. "He can score, pass and block shots. And when he adds some bulk, he'll be a complete player."

Walker has had only brief glimpses of what first-round draft pick (second overall) Marcus Camby can do. The forward from UMass has been slowed by a sprained ankle, but so far Walker has liked what he's seen.

In an exhibition loss to Golden State, Camby showed some of the form that made him the consensus college player of the year last season, scoring 15 points with six boards and three assists.

The next night, playing a pre-season high 37 minutes, he posted similar numbers.

Collegian staff members Luke Meredith and Casey Kane contributed to this article.

Steelers. If Houston continues to play hard nosed defense and can tie the Oilers, their division record could propel them to the division championship for the first time since they dealt Moon to Minnesota.

The AFC East is perhaps the toughest division in football. Discounting the Jets, which is easy to do despite them finally getting their first win, the division has a combined record of 19–10, with seven of those losses to each other.

Indianapolis is in a bit of a small slump right now, but even though they are beset by injuries, has a nice 5–3 record. Lucky for the Colts, they should start getting players back just as they gear up for the playoff run. If the offensive line can give Jim Harbaugh even a little protection they should be ready to improve on last year's playoff record.

Buffalo is much more accustomed to being in first place than Indy and New England, but they're the worst off of the three. They have an entire offensive controversy as they try to run a slower offense, yet see Jim Kelly struggle except when they're in the hurry up. The defense can only make up for their troubles for so long, and the Bills need to decide whether they want Kelly and the K-Gun or Todd Collins and the regular offense if they want to head to the playoffs again.

New England is in the midst of the most important string of games of the season, and is making the most of it, having beat Indy and Buffalo. The addition of Keith Byars, who caught seven against the Bills, seems to have given stability to the young offense, and the defense should improve when Ricky Reynolds returns. They have the latest in a series of must–win games against Miami this week before getting a brief break against the Jets. If they can win both of these, the Patriots will be 7–3 and have a good shot to make the playoffs.

Miami, on the other hand, is in trouble, having lost four of their last five. They should get a boost with Dan Marino and Fred Barnett returning, and with Johnson smoldering after the loss to Dallas, but it may not be enough.

So in the NFC it looks like San Francisco, Carolina, Green Bay, Dallas, Philadelphia and Washington will vie to face one of Denver, Kansas City, Pittsburgh, Houston, Indianapolis or New England in the next Super Bowl.

the game just makes Lynch that much smarter and intuitive, which in turn helps her to see plays and strategies before they happen.

"I definitely take pride and joy in stopping other teams from scoring, and then once we get the ball, you always have to vision of the entire field, see what's going on and it easier to make decisions," Lynch said.

"Defensively and offensively, I like to contribute. There's no way I can be a attacker, and I don't want to be just a defender, I want to contribute to the success of the team."

The tactically sound coaching style of Rudy is almost tailor–made for a player like Lynch. He has always got the most out of his players, as his ethic centers on all for one, and one for all positions. Understated as always, he has witnessed the creative genius of one–fourth of his defensive corps, and he thinks he'll keep her.

"She does so many difficult things easily," Rudy said. "Like run on to bouncing balls, that she picks right out of the air somehow on a first touch, and gets it played. And when she goes, she is always open.

"We call her 'The Dagger', she goes right up the belly of opponents when they do not expect it, and then there is a shot or a great serve. She is a wonderful player."

In a special class

Every once in a while, an athlete will come along, and with their steady, skillful play be put on the backburner when it comes to instant recognizability. They are so good at what they do that they make the game look easy. The spotlight then switches to someone else on the team, because it almost becomes boring to keep mentioning the sublime greatness of their game.

Let's use some local sports figures for examples: for every Norris Trophy winner like Ray Bourque, there is a Cam Neely, and for every Gold Glover like Dwight Evans, there is a Jim Rice. During the season, these type of players who are defensively strong are taken for granted. After the season, though, the plaudits and award–winning hardware piles up on their shelves.

This has happened to Lynch. Over her first three seasons she has been initially overshadowed by names like Paula Wilkins, Nicole Roberts and Rachel LeDuc. But in the end, her All–American and Atlantic 10 Player of the Year selections over the past two seasons speak loudly, clearly and for themselves.

Rudy tries to shy away from singling individuals on his team, at any space in time. The trademark of his coaching success has been team first, and any individuals can transfer out to schools like North Carolina later. But he can not deny the special class of player that is Erin Lynch.

"Lynch is a bigtime player, and one of the best in the country," Rudy said. "You do not recognize that until someone says 'stop looking at the game, and look at Erin Lynch and how she plays the game.'"

For the heir apparent to the senior leadership on defense, junior Erica Iverson has seen up close the true nature of Lynch's game. The normally outspoken defender shied away when asked about one of her partners in crime. For good reason, she is a big fan, and Lynch is one of a kind to her.

"I hate for you to put this in writing, but I have never had someone whose been an idol that is famous, or anything like that," Iverson said. "But if anyone asked me if I had an idol, its Erin. The intensity that she puts out there, some of the things she does, and how she plays the game is just everything I wish I could be, and could do."

A sort of homecoming

From her first steps on the Garber Field pitch as an admittedly nervous freshman, to Senior Day last Sunday afternoon, the emotional wheel for Lynch will not slow down, as she travels back to home territory for this weekend's Post Oak Mall Classic. It will all come down to this, as the four–year old girl with a soccer ball of the past will meet the immediate future in College Station, Texas.

"Well, as a team, this is the most important tournament of the year, because it will determine if we get into the NCAA's or not," Lynch said. "As a homecoming, I am just excited to see my family and my friends, and to play in front of that crowd. I mean, those are the people that helped me come to school at UMass, and to be able to go back and play for them will be great."

In the end, arrogance and flamboyance are the last things to come to mind about Lynch. All she wishes after her four year career at UMass is an early Christmas present, and that is one more trip to the NCAA's.

"Its kind of sad, because you've contributed a lot to the UMass soccer program, and to the university, and you want to end it in a positive way," Lynch said. "You want to be successful and give back half of what they've given to me. It's been a great experience, and I don't want it to end.

"I just want it to continue, and if we win these two games this weekend then I think we have a good chance to go on to the NCAA's. That has been the major goal of the season, and I think that can happen."

And if that happens, then Erin Lynch's final wish in a UMass uniform will come true.

and only some gloves for posts, was the place where the love of the game began.

Competing with the kids from the neighborhood started his career out, but summer hockey camps and his stint with the CJHL Gloucester Rangers solidified his sporting choice.

The early co–leader in team scoring, with Juden and Norris, did not even know about UMass initially. But after a little swaying from Mallen, the brand new Minuteman hockey program, with an opportunity for playing time, and the brand new rink, sold the Pioneer Valley for Fawcett.

"The best thing was that it was a new program, so I figured that it would be good to come into a new program and start off with a new start, and get my feet wet," Fawcett said. "So, I figured if I came here I would have a better chance of playing. Plus, it really is not that far from home, its not too bad, and some people think that Canada is really far away, but its not."

His own personal hockey development over the past two years has been gradual. Mallen has seen all the hard work Fawcett has put in, and is rewarding him now with the playing time.

"His freshman year when he came in he had a bad pair of skates, or something like that, and he was a freshman," Mallen said. "Now as a junior he has a lot more confidence, and that's the key right now, more confidence and that line is starting to interact a little better.

"He's paid his dues, he's worked hard the past two years, and now he's earning his playing time now. He deserves a lot of credit."

Fawcett knows he had to work on his game, and the scoring touch he had with the Rangers ('93–'94: 37g, 44a, 81pts) did not immediately translate to his UMass game. He did not dwell on that fact, and worked on his complete hockey game. The quietness of Fawcett, on and off the ice, looks like it is about to explode, and that can only mean good things for the Minutemen.

"The past few years I've been struggling with my scoring, so I have been trying to work on other stuff, like my defense," Fawcett said. "Offense comes off of good defense.

"We have a really good team this year, a lot of guys are committed to playing well, and doing whatever they have to, playing their roles. We have a lot seniors, and this is their last year, so we are going to do whatever we can for them to go out with a bang."

HOROSCOPES

ARIES
March 21-April 20

You may feel claustrophobic with a person who's set on doing things exactly by the rules. Give it a chance, and hold your tongue. You may gain some insight into the rules, as well as accomplishing your task a lot sooner.

TAURUS
April 21-May 21

Pay close attention to spending this week—with a little care, you could save big. Focus on housework to lift your spirits. A little effort pays off with gorgeous results. You could even feel inspired to greater things.

GEMINI
May 22-June 21

Work-related socializing is productive this week. You'll gain valuable information, but it's vital that you don't reveal too much. Small talk is a valuable skill for you to employ, even though it's not much fun.

CANCER
June 22-July 22

Pressures at work may be clamoring for your attention. Try to focus on something relaxing, without abdicating your responsibility. Looking at the big picture will help you gain valuable perspective.

LEO
July 23-August 23

Choose the right partner or team to accomplish more than any one person could do alone. Effective leadership of this group will be invisible—you don't want to divert productive energy into a power struggle.

VIRGO
August 24-September 22

Looking for love? Active pursuit is the key—with the emphasis on active. Take yourself out and do things that you love, rather than focusing on the search. The more you enjoy yourself, alone, the more irresistible you'll be.

LIBRA
September 23-October 23

Don't forget to pay an old debt or fulfill an old promise. It's better to generate goodwill than to apologize later. Besides, they haven't forgotten. Focus on career objectives to improve your circumstance over the long run.

SCORPIO
October 24-November 22

Add a new skill to your collection. It's a great way to make friends, and you never know when it will come in handy. You could manage to be in the right place at the right time. Now just be sure to say the right thing.

SAGITTARIUS
November 23-December 21

Seek additional income in an unusual place. It's a great way to add to your spending power without sacrificing precious personal time. Showcase your particular expertise for even better results.

CAPRICORN
December 22-January 20

A positive mood swing has you feeling as though you could conquer the world. Start with your own small corner, and you could be amazed at what you accomplish before you know it.

AQUARIUS
January 21-February 18

Focus on learning this week since you're in the mood anyway. But try to get yourself away from overly structured learning methods. You may be in need of some practical experience to fill out your theory.

PISCES
February 19-March 20

If you're faced with a particularly overwhelming task, try to delegate some responsibility. If you're all alone, break the job down into chunks of a smaller size. Take it one bite at a time, and you'll get it done without being swamped.

My friend BRAD was born overseas in Asia when the last purge happened. He likes it because it helps with girls at parties.

Personally, I think it's wrong to take advantage of his rare name. But I'll bet he's always looking over his shoulder for potential BRAD bigots.

I think people should be on guard against anti-BRADISM creeping subtly into their soul.

It's everywhere especially among the ignorant. I'm so glad I live in a college town where everything is less obvious.

Field hockey to play the Big Green

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

For the Massachusetts field hockey team, all thoughts of the NCAAs were directed toward Atlantic 10 conference games. But before the Minutewomen can put all of their energy into those final conference match-ups, they must concentrate on one final non-conference foe.

No. 8 University of Massachusetts (11-5, 4-0 Atlantic 10) will face Dartmouth (8-7, 2-3 Ivy League) today at 3:30 p.m. in New Hampshire for the last non-conference tilt of the season.

The Minutewomen dropped a 3-2 decision to the Big Green on last year, after Dartmouth scored a pair of goals in the final nine minutes of regulation to send the game into overtime. The Big Green then scored the winning tally with only two minutes remaining in the extra session, spoiling senior day festivities.

This year UMass travels to Chase Field, although there will be no senior day festivities to interrupt there (Dartmouth also has one game remaining). The team is coming off last Saturday's 2-1 defeat at the hands of Connecticut, in Storrs.

Senior Kyle Rothenberger notched UMass' only goal in the UConn game, sending the ball into the Husky cage when a scramble in front of the net occurred after a penalty corner. She leads the team in points with 25, and is tied for the lead in goals with 10. She has also recorded five assists.

Sophomore Erica Johnston stands even with Rothenberger at 10 goals and has a pair of assists to her credit to rank second in points with 22. Freshman Saskia Fuchs and sophomore Kate Putnam follow in the standings, as Fuchs has connected for six goals, Putnam for three. The duo is part of the penalty corner battery for UMass, working to earn nine assists apiece.

In goal, Hilary Rose has seen every minute of Minutewoman action, on her way to earning a .909 save percentage and a 1.01 goals against average.

Dartmouth is coming off a loss of its own, having been on the unfavorable side of a 3-2 overtime score at Cornell. The loss ended a two-game winning streak that saw the Big Green beat Yale and Vermont.

The role of offensive leader for Dartmouth falls on the shoulders of Lauren Scopaz, who has found the back of the opponent's net 12 times this year. Her goal total is nearly twice that of Dartmouth's next leading scorer, Weze Shorts, who has notched seven goals. Kelly Hannigan has contributed six goals and four assists, while Scopaz has also helped on four tallies.

Defensively the Big Green has relied on goalie Kendra Kosko, who has played all but 20 minutes of action in the DU cage. She has compiled a .805 save percentage and a 1.92 GAA, making 120 saves and allowing 29 goals on the year.

Dartmouth has dominated in the corner category, seeing 137 opportunities while its opponents have had 98.

After today's game, the Minutewomen return home for their final regular season contest against St. Joseph's at 1 p.m. Saturday. Before the game, UMass' will honor their seniors with the traditional Senior Day. The Minutewomen's game with the Hawks will be the deciding game for the A- 10 regular season title.

Quick start for Fawcett; junior line helping out hockey

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

The quiet aura surrounding the William D. Mullins Center for the Massachusetts hockey team (1-1, 1-1 in Hockey East) the past few seasons has been due to a variety of factors. The Minutemen are a new program, and have struggled with their defensive identity.

But the upcoming season has been predicted as the breakout season for this team, and for a few of their important role players.

One of those players is junior forward Chris Fawcett (2 goals, 1 assist, 3 points). For his first two seasons in the Maroon and White, he has been a quiet presence, both on and off the ice. But this season is looked upon as breakout seasons for both him and his fellow linemates, juniors Dean Campanale (1 assist) and Dan Juden (1g, 2a, 3pts), and they could not have started out better.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS
Chris Fawcett

In the first two games of the season, a 5-2 loss and 4-2 win over UMass-Lowell, the junior line has done its share in helping the senior line of co-captains Tom Perry and Rob Bonneau (1g, 1a, 2pts), and Warren Norris (1g, 2a, 3pts).

So far, the juniors have accounted for half of the team's goal production. That kind of scoring touch will be vital for this weekend, as UMass will face conference powerhouse and No. 3 nationally ranked Boston University in a home and home series.

For Fawcett, he knows the importance of his fellow junior's roles as offensive backup this year, and their No. 1 status next season after the graduations of this years seniors.

"I think we are going to play a big part this year," Fawcett said. "We got Newfie [Norris], Bonneau and Perry in the number one line, but sometimes they are going to have an off night, and that is where we are going to have to pick it up. We just need to fall in behind the seniors.

"We have a lot of depth this year, but they are going to be gone next year. So, we got to keep going from this year, and continue next year. We have to try and produce as many goals as we can, but at the same time play some defense, which will help out the club even more."

Coach Joe Mallen has seen the steady improvement through the preseason of his junior line, and he has liked what he has seen out of Fawcett so far. In their last preseason game against the Polish National team, a 6-1 win, Fawcett picked up two goals and an assist, and his line once again shared the distinction of half of the goal production.

"Early in the preseason they were just not getting a lot accomplished, and I got on them a little bit," Mallen said. "Since then I think they really have played well. We need scoring from our juniors and sophomores, and with [Fawcett] personally, its an important role with the team to get that junior line scoring.

"The contributions that line, and Chris, has made so far has been really helpful, and in both of the exhibition games and the [4-2] win last Saturday night."

From the start of preseason workouts, Fawcett knew that he and his linemates would have to pick up their play after a slow start. He accredits their initial rustiness to not being truly acquainted with each other, and can only see bright horizons ahead for the junior forward trio.

"In preseason, the coach was worried a little bit because we hadn't been scoring in tryouts," Fawcett said. "It takes time, because we really hadn't played as a line before. I have played with [Dan] Juden occasionally, and Dean [Campanale] every now and then, and this is the first time that we have been an actual unit for a full game.

"I think we should do pretty well, Dean's pretty fast and Juden has a lot of speed, too, and they both got great scoring ability."

From day one, Fawcett has been around the game of hockey. His father Gary was a coach, and had helped him out with his game, coaching him in his earlier years. Right across from his house in Gloucester, Ontario, an outdoor rink with no nets,

Redskins league's biggest shock, Carolina at top of NFC West

Time flies when you're having fun, so it should come as no surprise that the National Football League is halfway through it's regular season.

And while some teams are already playing out the string, others are ready to make their push for the playoffs.

In the NFC West, if the Falcons — a playoff team last year — can't win next week against Carolina, they'll match their worst record ever (0-9) which was established in the franchise's first year. On the other hand, the Panthers, in just their second year, have never lost more than five in a row.

Now the Panthers are vying with the 49ers for the division championship. The new kids on the block aren't as good as the five-time champions, but they have some advantages. The 49ers are banged up very badly — Elvis Grbac is out, and even if Steve Young plays, he's coming off a concussion and still has a pulled groin. That leaves Jeff Brohm, who, despite success in Houston, isn't likely to win that much. J.J. Stokes is also out for several weeks, though he may have already lost his job to his replacement, rookie Terrell Owens. The biggest game for the 49ers now isn't Dallas. It's the rematch against Carolina, who they lost to the first time around.

In the NFC West it's all Green Bay, but it's not all easy. After losing Robert Brooks and Antonio Freeman, Brett Favre is running out of people to throw it to. Nonetheless, he's good enough to make mediocre receivers look better, and the Pack should keep rolling. The big question is can they beat Dallas in Dallas, something they've failed at the last six times. If so, they're headed to the Super Bowl. If not, they've still got a fight on their hands.

The rest of the teams in the ol' Norris division are done, though they could still spoil some other teams' hopes. Minnesota has a good record so far, but they lost Warren Moon and Robert Smith for at least a few weeks on Monday, and Chris Carter and Jake Reed aren't enough on their own.

Detroit is in disarray after the horrible loss to the Giants and the quarterback confusion. Wayne Fontes pulled Scott Mitchell — who had thrown three interceptions — in the middle of a series in the first half. Later, backup Don Majkowski had to leave for a play. Mitchell completed one pass, and was pulled again, to his obvious frustration and anger. That's not how to treat a QB that is supposed to lead you to the playoffs, and it could cost Fontes his job at the end of the season. The team isn't going to pull off their traditional end of the season streak for the coach if they don't like him anymore.

The NFC East, supposedly the weakest division in football, has proven not to be. Even the Giants and Cardinals have racked up a few victories, though they won't be in the playoffs this year.

Dallas and Philadelphia are both playing like expected, and have a big game against each other on Sunday. Philly probably has a slight edge as they'll want revenge for their last game and Dallas is coming off the big win over former coach Jimmy Johnson. The winner drops to 5-4, but considering how good these teams are, and how weak the rest of the NFC is, they'll still be playoff contenders.

The Redskins, in the midst of a seven game win streak after their opening day loss, are the season's biggest surprise. They've already won more games than they did last season and they don't have a tough schedule ahead. They still have to play the offense-less Bills, the Giants, the Cardinals, and the Cowboys, who they swept last year.

The playoff picture isn't anywhere near as clear in the AFC. In the West, Denver has emerged as the forerunner with the best offense in the league and a surprisingly tough defense. Their main challenge remains Kansas City, a very good team, even if they aren't flashy. Denver, at 7-1, has the best record in the NFL (tied with Green Bay and Washington) only needs to win about three more to clinch a spot, and KC is good enough to get what it needs to continue its league-leading streak of playoff appearances.

San Diego and Oakland both have themselves situated for a run at 4-4, but they're long shots. San Diego's schedule is too tough, and they finally seem to have lost too much in the off-season. The Raiders, despite winning recently, are still in some disarray and will have trouble against the good teams in the league.

The Central division is already down to just two teams — Pittsburgh and Houston. Pittsburgh is again doing it with a subpar quarterback and a major defensive player out for the season. This year it's Jerome Bettis who's providing the heroics. Pitts' biggest problem is its division record (3-2) as their only losses have come from Jacksonville and Houston. The Oilers are 4-1 against AFC Central teams, with the loss coming to the Hoping to avoid a letdown after Friday's big win over Rhode Island, the Massachusetts volleyball team travels south tonight to take on the Connecticut Huskies in a non-conference match-up.

The Minutewomen are hoping to avenge last season's loss to the University of Connecticut, when they fell in five games in the first-ever match in the Mullins Center.

The University of Massachusetts (18-6, 7-4 A-10) has something to be happy about going into this evening's contest. It's riding a modest two-match winning streak, and freshman middle blocker Jill Meyers was named the Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week for the third time this year.

What's more, the Minutewomen, coached by Bonnie Kenny, holds a 14-10-1 all-time record against the Lady Huskies, dating back to 1975, including this year's 3-0 win.

However, the Lady Huskies (14-9) of the Big East have won their last four matches by a combined 12-1 score. And they seem to be a team of trends, having lost the four matches before the streak, and having won the four matches prior to that one. Another factor going against Massachusetts is UConn's 8-1 home record, combined with its own 3-4 mark on the road.

Senior Dionne Nash leads the Minutewomen in kills per game, with 4.5, while freshman middle blocker Kari Hogancamp leads her teammates in digs per game, with 3.9. Meyers, meanwhile, is averaging four kills per game, second on the team, and her .336 hitting percentage ranks her third in the A-10. She also leads the team in blocks with 0.83 per game.

And the player responsible for most of those kills is sophomore setter Katie Pearce, who has 70 or more assists in her last two matches, and is averaging 14. 2 assists per game.

"I think we'll win," said Pearce. "We've already beaten them once before. And we've had good practices all week and everyone's pretty confident, especially after what we did against Rhode Island."

UConn is led by Anyette Ryne, who has paced the Huskies in kills, with 3,984 per game, and digs, with 3.519 per game. Jenelle Koester, however, has tallied the most kills overall, with a total of 268.

Friday's win over first-place Rhode Island was the most significant match of the year for the Minutewomen, as they ended the Rams' 12-match winning streak and were the first A-10 squad to beat them. The team from the nation's smallest state is now 10-1 in the conference.

After tomorrow, UMass next game is at St. Bonaventure on Friday.

Unsung hero Lynch closing UMass career

Flamboyance and arrogance.

Whether we like it or not, these are traits that we look for when judging the greatness of athletes in our sporting culture. Fan and press recognition seem to go to athletes who are either in/out of a court case, or do a little dance when they make a little glove, and so on and so forth.

But true greatness is judged in the light of solid day in-day out play, and unassuming team sacrifice. For the No. 20 Massachusetts women's soccer team (13-2-1, 7-0-1 in the Atlantic 10), they have a player with these rare and incomparable qualities, and she is senior defender Erin Lynch. Who, you ask? Its true, you might have walked by your two-time All-American and Atlantic 10 Player of the Year on the Concourse, and would not have known it. Like wise old grunge-rocker Neil Young once said, "She was an unknown legend... in her time." Over the past four years, her flamboyance has been the quiet and steady mastering of a game that involves both the delicate of touches, and the most powerful of runs and tackles. Since 1993, her arrogance has involved her purposeful mission to not distinguish herself in the heart of a historically-based, rock-solid University of Massachusetts defense.

Lynch knows the tradition of the UMass women's soccer program, and knows what it means to put on the Maroon and White. Legendary UMass players, like 1990 Hermann Trophy award winner April Kater and 1996 Olympic gold medalist Briana Scurry, have worn the colors of UMass. She feels that pride as well, especially in the face of adversity.

"When you go on the field wearing the UMass uniform, you have confidence and you don't think that nobody can stop you," Lynch said. "I am not going to create too much attention for myself, I like to get everyone involved, and have everyone feel like they're contributing.

"Anything that I can do in being a leader on the team to get everyone involved, and feeling comfortable, will only contribute to our success."

Renaissance player

When you look at the complete game of Lynch, defense is her forte, but she does so many things well. From marking attackers to dissecting an opponent's offense by serving a ball up field in a teammates stride, she can be considered a Renaissance "player."

For example, in the team's first loss of the season to Dartmouth last October 15th, when the chips were down, the most effective striker for UMass was Lynch. As the Big Green defense marked the freshmen forward tandem of Emma Kurowski and Kate Webb, Lynch was making the most effective runs upfield; using deft back-heel and side- foot touches which left the Ivy Leaguers all tied up.

"You saw the level of Erin Lynch today, and Erin Lynch is one of the upperclassmen that responded to the challenge of 'let's step it up' [and win the second half]," Rudy said after the Dartmouth game. "Erin Lynch said 'the hell with this, I'm not going down without a fight.'"

Being able to master all parts of

Forum at UM to team Kerry and Kennedy with Olver and Riley

By Beth McCarthy
Collegian Staff

Senators John F. Kerry, Edward M. Kennedy, Congressman John Olver and U.S. Department of Education (DoE) Secretary Richard Riley, will be at the University of Massachusetts today at 12:30 p.m. in the Cape Cod Lounge, Student Union Building, to push the Democratic educational agenda and listen to the concerns of students.

"This educated town meeting is to provide an opportunity for students, faculty and town members of the surrounding towns to discuss with Kerry, Kennedy and Riley their concerns about education and education policy in the U.S.," said Andy Soloman, spokesperson for the Democratic Coordinated Campaign.

Soloman added that they wanted to "highlight the stark differences between the parties" on higher education policy.

"It's really important for the voters to see the real difference between Kerry and [Govenor William F.] Weld — especially on the issue of education," Jay Bragg, president of College Democrats at UMass.

According to Bragg, who helped coordinate this event, there will be short introductory speeches made by each official, followed by a question-and-answer session where members of the audience can "feel free to ask questions."

Bragg said that event organizers intended for the event to be informal and conducive to students who may have issues to voice.

"We want to hear from the students on their concerns," Bragg said. "There will be a strong encouragement to get out and vote."

Soloman said that this meeting will last for approximately an hour. He added that the Amherst campus was chosen because it is the "flagship" institution of public higher education in the Commonwealth, and also because of the large concentration of student votes in the region.

"It's important for students to be involved," Soloman said.

Kerry is in the last week of his campaign to retain his seat in the Senate against Weld. Kennedy and Riley have supported his efforts in the past months to sway student votes in his direction.

In related news, President Bill Clinton announced that he will come to Springfield to support the Kerry campaign Sunday, although exact details have not been released.

Scientologists to face more German scrutiny

MUNICH, Germany (AP) — In the latest step in Germany's campaign against Scientology, the state of Bavaria will require applicants for state jobs to disclose if they have any relationship with the church.

Scientology members will not be automatically disqualified from civil service jobs, but will have to convince the potential employer in a follow-up interview of his or her suitability, according to the new rules issued Tuesday. They take effect Friday. Companies seeking to do business with the state must also publicly distance themselves from Scientology, the state government said.

The head of the Los Angeles-based church, Heber Jentzsch, condemned the policy as discriminatory and said Scientology would take legal action to recover any damages resulting from it. While Scientology is recognized as a religion in the United States and dozens of other countries, Germany views it as a dangerous sect.

Duke's Klan past used in Ca. ad campaign

SACRAMENTO, Calif. (AP) — Foes of a ballot initiative that would eliminate most affirmative action programs in California launched a $1 million TV ad campaign today highlighting former Klansman David Duke's support for the measure.

Duke came to the state in September to argue in support of Proposition 209 at a debate. His appearance at California State University at Northridge drew hundreds of angry protesters who were repelled by riot-clad police. Members of the initiative's campaign committee also condemned Duke's appearance.

The initiative on the Nov. 5 ballot would outlaw preferences in state hiring, contracting and education, thus dismantling many affirmative action programs.

The new commercial begins with a video of Duke at the Northridge debate, and then fades into footage showing the former Ku Klux Klan leader from Louisiana in full white-robed regalia.

"He's not just another guy in a business suit," the narrator says. "He's David Duke, former head of the Ku Klux Klan. And he's come to California to support Prop. 209."

Other supporters named in the commercial include conservatives Newt Gingrich and Pat Buchanan.

Named as opponents to the measure in the ad are President Clinton and retired Gen. Colin Powell, who enjoy support in the state.

The ad comes a day after Republican presidential candidate Bob Dole gave strong support to the initiative, saying it "represents and applies America's best principles."

SGA addresses dorm fire drills

Housing rescinds policy of room sweeps at senators' urging

By Raghuram Vadarevu
Collegian Staff

A few weeks ago, the University of Massachusetts Undergraduate Senate passed a motion to stop residence hall staff from checking rooms during fire drills on campus, specifically the Southwest Residential Area.

In a memo issued by Housing Services, Director Michael Gilbert said that Housing has "ceased the practice of building-wide fire drill room searches."

Many Student Government Association (SGA) senators were pleased by the response, but did express some dissatisfaction.

"We are displeased because the reasons of health and safety are ambiguous and undefined and these create loopholes," said Sen. Seth Avakian, the Southwest Area Government representative to the Student Senate.

Sen. Avakian commented referring to the Housing memo, which stated "for reasons of health and safety, Housing services staff may again elect to enter some student rooms without prior notice during a fire drill."

With the suspension of the policy, Housing and the SGA will collaborate on a new policy to be implemented by the end of the semester, according to Brian Tirrell, speaker of the Undergraduate Senate.

According to Southwest Area senators, the fire drills were used as a cover for locating lounge furniture and other illegal items in students' rooms.

The room sweeps were alleged by the Student Senate to be unconstitutional because the senators claimed the policy violated the fourth amendment of the United States Constitution, which protects people from illegal search and seizure.

According to senators from Southwest, there were several incidents where residents were documented for possessing lounge furniture in their rooms, a practice that is illegal, according to Housing's residence hall manual.

The memo said that "Housing Services will rescind any and all documented Student Code/Housing Policy violations that occurred as a result of the room inspections in John Adams and Washington and the room sweeps announcement in Thoreau Hall."

"I think that my constituents are very pleased with the part that Housing are going to rescind all floor write-ups (for possession of lounge furniture)," Jennifer Casasanto (SW- John Adams) said. Casasanto authored the original motion with Sen. Avakian.

She added that Housing Services, through their response, indirectly admitted they were wrong about the room sweep policy.

"It is a step in the right direction," Tirrell said. "I am pretty much relieved that Housing is being reasonable on this issue. I don't think that (the room sweeps) should have been done in the first place."

Tirrell says that the Senate agrees that Housing can go in to rooms in the event of an emergency, but does not agree with Housing reserving the right to enter rooms.

According to the memo, residents of John Adams, Washington and Thoreau Residence Halls will be sent a letter "to clarify room entry policy and apologize for any real or perceived violations of the terms of the Housing Contract."

In other matters, several motions have been delayed in committees. The motions concern the 1992 ALANA (Asian, Latino, Native American) agreements, student trustee voting power on the Board of Trustees and a resolution to reinstate the Off-Campus Meal Plan in the Top of the Campus Restaurant in the Campus Center.

Police investigating alleged armed robbery

By Laura Stock
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts police reported yesterday that an alleged incident of armed robbery occurred Tuesday night in Patterson Residence Hall.

According to Chief of Police John Luippold, a group of three to four men entered through the open door of a male student's room, closed the door behind them, and told the individual they wanted his money.

"The victim says he saw one of the assailants pulling something out of his coat which he believed to be a handgun," Luippold said.

Luippold also said another witness in the room at the time saw the assailant make a motion toward his coat which indicated that he may have had a handgun.

"The young man relinquished what money he had, at which point the males left the room," Luippold said.

Luippold said the victim had over $100 stolen.

The assailants also threatened the victim, saying he better not come after them, according to Luippold.

The only description of the assailants at this time is that they were three, possibly four, African American males, Luippold said.

"We are currently working with him [the victim] to get a further description of the individuals," Luippold said.

Another incident occurred around the same time Tuesday night in Pierpont Residence Hall, police sources said.

According to Luippold, a female student woke up to find two male individuals in her room, who then left when they saw her.

Luippold said the student had a "hard time" describing the individuals, because she had just woken up and the room was dark.

However, the student did describe the males as being African-American.

At this point, Luippold said, nothing is believed to have been stolen.

"We've been over on the floors in Pierpont trying to get a description from individuals who may have seen anyone in the area at that time," Luippold said.

Police do not have sufficient evidence that the two incidents are related.

"Public Safety is still investigating the possibility of the incident in Pierpont being related to the incident in Patterson, but as of this date, we have not yet confirmed that," Luippold said. "We are now having conversations with Housing about telling students that they really need to be locking their doors and calling Public Safety if they see anyone suspicious."

Luippold also said he believes that staff in Patterson are planning dorm or floor meetings for tonight to tell students that they need to be more proactive and diligent with regards to residence hall safety.

As with every year on Halloween, residence halls will be locked for 24 hours tonight and throughout the weekend.

Dance team set to appear in Nationals

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

Next April, the University of Massachusetts' dance team will travel to Daytona, Fla. for the team's first appearance in the national championship competition.

The two co-captains, Janine Santilli and Kellie Shea, act as coaches during practices. The UMass cheerleading coach, Kevin Thompson, also assists on a limited basis in a advisory role.

"We don't have a coach or a practice spot, so [Thompson] meets with us when he can. He meets with us before Midnight Madness and before we compete to look our routine over and point out any errors that he might see," said Shea, a third year member of the team.

"Due to lack of time and space, I help them when I can. They get practice time on the floor with the cheerleaders, especially before big events like Midnight Madness," Thompson said.

The team practices three times a week. They find places to practice but are usually not allowed to stay for long periods of time, according to Santilli.

"We have practiced in the Southside Room in Southwest [Residential Area] or the 19th floor of [the John Adams

Kerry, Weld return to debate site

By Glen Johnson
Associated Press

BOSTON — Although their debates are now history, Gov. William F. Weld and Sen. John Kerry returned Tuesday to Faneuil Hall to reiterate what they feel are the key distinctions raised in their face-to-face meetings.

Weld said Kerry, the Democratic incumbent, campaigns one way but legislates another. Kerry, appearing later at an outdoor rally with hundreds of women, said his Republican opponent supports policies that would especially hurt women and working-class people. Both appeals targeted the roughly 12 percent of undecided voters identified in most recent polls.

To Weld, a key difference between the Senate candidates is that he will absolutely oppose any increase in taxes, yet Kerry has a history of supporting them.

"Senator Kerry's attack here is batically an assertion by him that it's not possible to cut taxes, and I'm not buying that. And the best place to look for evidence of that is not his failure to cut taxes the last 12 years, but our success at cutting taxes," Weld said as he stood next to cardboard cutouts depicting "Senator Kerry" and "Candidate Kerry."

For Kerry, a revealing difference is that Weld supports Bob Dole's $550 billion tax cut proposal, yet he cannot say how he will make up for the revenue loss. Kerry and many economists say it will inevitably prompt cuts in education, social and healthcare spending.

"He wants to come in with the Bob Dole-Bill Weld tax cut, blow a hole in the deficit, reward a lot of rich folks with a big tax give-back at the expense of senior citizens on Medicare, at the expense of kids on their college loans. All economists say 'I think there is a pattern that has emerged of Senator Kerry wanting to wish away the truth," Weld said.

The speakers at the Kerry women's rally included his wife, Teresa Heinz; Vicki Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy; Angela Menino, wife of Boston Mayor Tom Menino; and Carol Browner, head of the federal Environmental Protection Agency. Also attending were Kerry's mother and an aunt from England.

Many talked about Kerry's support for a minimum-wage increase and abortion rights, as well as his opposition to conservative Supreme Court nominees such as Clarence Thomas and Robert Bork. Kerry cited other countries where women have taken leadership roles, including England, Israel, Pakistan and India.

"We in this country are lagging behind in our ability to recognize and to honor the place that women play in our life," he said. "We should not be content in this country until women earn what men earn, or more, for the same job."

Residence Hall), but we usually get kicked out. People tell us we don't belong there," she said.

The team does a full warm up then they work on their routines. "[Shea] and I play the coach role. We walk around and try to help with problems," Santilli said.

"They are doing a great job. The team is very dedicated and they have worked very hard to get to the nationals," he said.

Over the summer, four members of the team, Santilli, Shea, Kim Lass and Julie Landouceur attended a dance camp while UMass cheerleaders attended cheerleading camp at Boston University. The event was sponsored by the National Cheerleading Association.

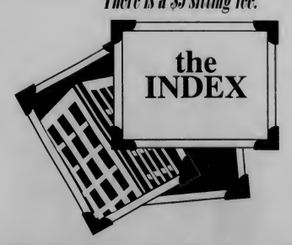
The Dance team won a bid to compete in nationals as well as the "most collegiate dance team." Juniors Lass and Landouceur both won "Top Gun" awards, which are given to individuals for outstanding effort in a specific area of dance.

Lass won two of these awards for kicks and leaps and Landouceur won in turns.

"In order to attend Nationals, we are raising $10,000 on our own," said Santilli, a junior psychology major.

The team hopes that through the Alumni Association and dance team alumni donations, selling Avon and candy bars and a $250 allocation from the Student Government Association (SGA), they will be able to raise the money that they need to attend Nationals.

"The girls are doing a great job at getting recognized and getting more support. The more support they get, the more their situation will improve," Thompson said.



"By going to the Nationals we are representing UMass, but many people still don't even know we exist," Shea said. "Dancing on the team is a form of expression and it's also a great feeling to be involved in a team."

"This school is so big that by being on a team you can actually feel like your part of the school," Landoceaur said.

"We want people to know that we are here at UMass, that we are a team," Santilli said.

Greeks raise money for kids

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

To celebrate Halloween, Lambda Chi Alpha and Sigma Delta Tau at the University of Massachusetts will present the "House of Horrors" from 4 to 9 p.m. tonight.

All proceeds will benefit the National Center for Prevention of Child Abuse.

The cost is $4 for adults (16 and over) and $3 for students and children. The "House of Horrors" is open to the UMass community, as well as Amherst and other surrounding towns for children ages 10 and up. It will be held at Lambda Chi Alpha, 374 N. Pleasant St.

WHMP, 99.3 will broadcast live from the event.

Vice President of Lambda Chi Alpha Jeremy Starke said the night will be "fun for everyone."

"It will be a good time and we will raise money for a great cause," he said.

The National Center for the Prevention of Child Abuse helps educate families about abuse and informs women and children where to go if they are involved in abusive relationships.

Through donations, the center offers hotlines, counselling and supporting children in abusive families, as well as helping children find safe homes.

Christina Egan, a member of Sigma Delta Tau, a service sorority, said that "the money raised from the House of Horrors is not benefitting the Greek system at all. All the money raised will go directly to the Massachusetts chapter, [for the Prevention of Child Abuse.]"

Last April, the sisters of Sigma Delta Tau wore blue ribbons to raise awareness against child abuse prevention and battered women. They also set up a table to hand out literature on abuse prevention and blue ribbons to the UMass community.

In addition to this event, the fraternity will be conducting a national food drive, "Brothers Feeding Others," on Nov. 2.

All 220 chapters nationwide will be participating in this event.

Yesterday, fraternity members dropped off food collection bags to local businesses participating in the food drive. They will be picked up on Saturday morning. Brothers will also stand at local supermarkets to ask for donations.

"I think it's incredible that nationally we will all be working together to help fight hunger," Starke said.

All donations will be given to the Amherst Food Shelter. A goal of 2,500 pounds of food has been set.

Last week, the brothers invited a speaker from the Everywomen's Center to discuss issues about date rape, violence and other related topics.

Starke said that the main focus of discussion was responsibility. "If we have a party then it is our responsibility, to stop any violent situations that arise and not wait for other people who know the victim to help," he said.

As a follow up to this workshop, Lambda Chi Alpha will be inviting another speaker from EWC to speak to the entire Greek system and the UMass community. This workshop is scheduled to be held in the Campus Center sometime in early December.

WASHINGTON — The U.S. economy slowed dramatically during the summer, advancing at less than half last spring's torrid pace as exhausted consumers took a breather.

The Commerce Department reported Wednesday that the gross domestic product, the total output of goods and services, rose at an annual rate of just 2.2 percent from July through September, compared to a 4.7 percent second-quarter increase.

Republican presidential candidate Bob Dole quickly said the latest GDP figure showed the economy is "barely afloat." But President Clinton, who has based much of his re-election campaign on his stewardship of the economy, viewed the GDP figure as confirmation that "our economy continues to grow steady and strong."

For their part, private economists welcomed the slowdown. They said it would help keep inflation in check and further postpone interest rate hikes by the Federal Reserve.

A Fed report released Wednesday on the state of the economy seemed to support that view. In its latest national survey of business conditions, the Fed said the economy continues to expand, but "the pace of growth reportedly has slowed somewhat." For its part, the Clinton administration insisted that the sharp slowdown in growth carries no threat of possible recession but is rather a moderation that would further prolong what is already the third-longest recovery since World War II.

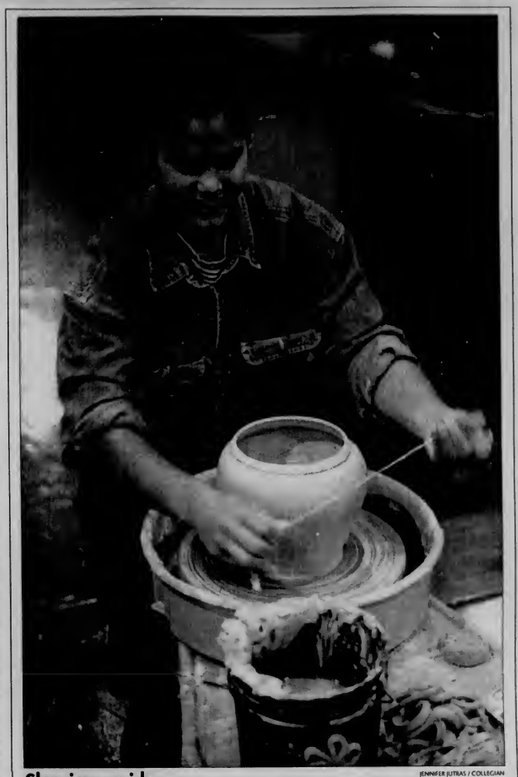
Laura D'Andrea Tyson, head of the president's National Economic Council, called the current expansion a "real achievement of this administration" by keeping interest rates low through its deficit-reduction efforts.

But campaigning in Clarksville, Tenn., Dole told a campus rally that "the truth about the Clinton economy is getting easier to see. ... This is a real economic slowdown."

Financial markets, however, worried that the economy is not slowing enough. Stocks and bonds lost ground with investors blaming the declines in part on worries raised by a separate housing report that sales are still at too high a level for the Fed's comfort. The Dow Jones industrial average dipped 13.79 to close at 5,993.23.

The Commerce Department reported that new homes were sold at a robust annual rate of 816,000 units in September, down just 0.5 percent from August, which had been the highest sales rate in a decade.

The Fed survey, done in preparation for the next rate setting meeting on Nov. 13, noted "few indications of significant price pressures" for raw materials or goods, but it said reports of higher wage pressures were more widespread.



Still, many private economists said they expect the 2.2 percent GDP increase of the third quarter to be followed by growth around that level in the fourth quarter as well. Those figures would keep the central bank on hold for the rest of this year and well into 1997, many analysts predicted.

"U.S. economic growth has downshifted and we expect growth to remain modest going forward," said Cheryl Katz, senior economist at Merrill Lynch in New York.

The GDP report showed that price pressures actually eased in the third quarter, with a GDP inflation gauge rising just 1.9 percent at an annual rate, the best performance in three years.

The 2.2 percent expansion of the economy compared to a 2 percent GDP rise in January-March. Analysts said the spring 4.7 percent spurt was an aberration that reflected a torrent of consumer spending after an unusually severe winter.

They said the 2.2 percent third quarter slowdown was more sustainable and should prolong the current expansion, which began in March 1991.

Two worlds collide

David Chan

The following story was written in light of the recent quota controversy surrounding Boston Latin High School...

Danny was a tough and independent boy. He was well trained from his rough childhood. His father had left him and his mother when Danny was very young, so he didn't really get to know his father. Danny's mother had been working two jobs since then to support Danny and his little brother. His mother felt bad for her two kids, especially Danny. There was no fatherly figure around and money was always an issue. She didn't have time to help her children with their schoolwork and even if she had, she wouldn't have been much help since she never even finished high school. Nonetheless, she knew Danny was a strong and smart kid. He took very good care of his little brother too.

Growing up in the inner-city was not only challenging, but stressful. Danny's mother never stopped worrying about her children's safety. Even the recent installment of metal detectors did not appease her concern. She felt that this was long overdue anyway. Schools should think about having dogs to sniff out drugs as well. The drug problem was just as bad. It was a shame that the school system had to concentrate their budget on the safety of the students. Money was seldom spent on supplies, books and computers.

Danny's mother placed significant hope in her boy. She loved watching him study every night. She loved rewarding him for all his good report cards. But most of all, she loved the teacher conferences. Teachers couldn't rave enough about Danny's potential. He had an outstanding work ethic.

Although Danny did not have many resources because of his disadvantaged economic background, his teachers encouraged him to apply to a good, reputable high school. They knew that Danny would continue his academic success while in high school. They knew he would flourish in a good high school, and that this would give him a greater chance of earning an opportunity to attend an elite college. Danny's mother knew that this was the chance for Danny to learn in a better environment. He was special. He was going to break out of the inner-city and bring success into the family...

Now on the other side of town, there was Edward. Both of Edward's parents held college degrees and were professionals. Edward never really had anything to worry about. He looked forward to the family's yearly summer vacations at Martha's Vineyard and the Christmas vacations in Florida to see his grandparents. He and all his friends have been playing organized baseball since they were 10. Edward's team even won the district champs.

School was always fun for Edward too. He loved the computers that the school recently purchased. They were just as good as the two that he had at home. Classes were always small and personal. Edward always got to know all his teachers. Homework was never a problem for Edward either, since his parents were usually readily available to help him.

Edward was a good student. His teachers may not have raved about him to the extent of throwing a party, but they did mention that he would succeed — just like most of the kids in the neighborhood. He had the background and the resources. There was nothing that could stop Edward from continuing the success of his family.

Edward's parents wanted him to take the entrance exam for that good, reputable high school on the other end of town. His parents had attended it, and so had his older sister, who now goes to Princeton. Edward's parents, as well as his teachers, prepared him for the exam. Most of the other students were going to take the entrance exam as well.

When Edward went to take the exam, he sat next to Danny. Edward could tell that Danny probably went to the other school. Not many students from Danny's school took the entrance exam for this good, reputable high school. Edward admired Danny for his courage. He never saw much of Danny's kind around his neighborhood.

Danny could tell where Edward was from too. He knew that everybody from Edward's neighborhood went to this good, reputable high school. Danny knew he was up against some well prepared students.

A week after the test, the results and decisions were mailed out. Danny's score was good and so was Edward's. Danny had the highest score to ever come out of his school. But Edward's was just slightly higher. Danny was not admitted into the good, reputable high school. Edward was.

Danny's background and unique experiences could have contributed to the student body. His story could have been a learning experience for other students, but the good, reputable high school had decided this year that numbers were the only way to judge a student's potential. They were the only criteria they looked at.

Unfortunately for Danny, he will always be a step behind Edward as long as they compete solely on numbers.

An Eco–friendly candidate

Dan Bodah

The Green Party has some fundamental characteristics that set it apart from the other parties involved in U.S. politics. Most inspiring of trust, the Greens are not organized as a top–down hierarchy, but instead as a network of citizens. What this translates into is a federation of diverse groups all working together on certain principles. There's no official party dogma that all groups have to agree with, but this doesn't mean that various Green groups have no solidarity or cohesion. For a decentralized political group, there are some amazingly well–organized responses to pressing social and political problems laid out in the collection of Green platforms (www.greens.org.)

Ralph Nader, the Greens' presidential candidate, is not a typical contender for the presidency in any way. A lot of attention has been given in the media to the fact that Nader never sought a nomination, but was drafted by the Greens. Basically, he's allowing them to run him as a candidate, instead of running himself actively. And there is no hammered–out, cast–in–stone platform that's agreed upon by both Nader and the Greens.

Nader's also not raising or accepting any campaign funds. Most people probably see this as evidence of insanity; however, integrity is closer to the truth. Here we have a campaign that's enacting campaign finance reform, instead of blathering about how necessary it is, and plugging a few insignificant little fine tunings.

Nader's also pretty outspoken against big government itself, having said things like "big government and big business — sometimes it's hard to distinguish between the two." He has spent years fighting the government, mostly on environmental and consumer safety issues, but more generally on all issues where profit and democracy come into conflict.

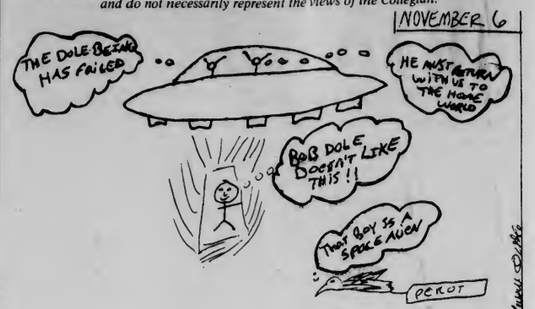
It's a pretty common perception that parties other than the two who have been ruling us unhindered for decades might have some interesting stands on issues like the environment, but simply wouldn't know how to deal with biggies such as international policy, economics and crime. I checked out some Green platforms on these very issues and was surprised to find well–articulated policies.

Economics is a big one. It seems like whichever direction we turn, we're surrounded by either capitalists offering to let us be sacrificed to the Gods of Capital, or socialists of some ilk telling us that if we only give them all our money, they'll be sure to distribute it evenly back to us. In neither case do we have anything resembling economic democracy. The Greens, however, lay out a plan that is neither socialist nor capitalist.

A big move would be developing tools for determining hidden costs and values of various jobs and industries. For instance, wealth created by those outside the formal economy, such as parents and community volunteers, is usually acknowledged. The Greens call for the recognition that these roles contribute something of substantial value to our society as a whole. Thus, parents raising children at home are working, and this fact would be recognized. As far as hidden costs, we can calculate somewhat accurately the true cost (in destruction of natural resources, loss of human life, etc.) of cars. This would allow us to understand that they are actually a lot more expensive than the price quoted by the dealer.

Perhaps more importantly, the Greens call for an end to monolithic capitalism — instead, they see a future where economy is local or regional, so that the consumers, workers and owners will interact more democratically. This deals with many of the social costs of capitalism, such as alienation and structural unemployment, and could lead to a shift in class structures. Other measures, such as generous minimum wages and a maximum wage, could also contribute to a resolution of class inequities.

The platform hopes to see many of these measures implemented globally, and thus, the Greens are somewhat of an internationalist party. However, their ideas of decentralization and democratic self–determination lead to foreign policy stands that resemble the U.S. government's original isolationist policies. The Greens don't feel that the U.S. or any other country should interfere in, say, the Middle East. They call for a hands–off approach, especially in light of the fact that U.S. foreign policy is often decided with the interests of international capital at the forefront.



Nader is not on the ballot in every state, but he can be written in, as can anyone else. He says straight out that he doesn't expect to win; however, he hopes his candidacy will have the long–term effect of increasing grassroots involvement in the political process. He sees his bid for the presidency as a first step toward a possible future in which voters could make a true choice, rather than a wincing resignation when they cast their vote.

ON NOVEMBER 5TH HE LOST. ON THE 6TH THEY COME BACK FOR HIM

Don't let me down...

Bob Dunn

Dear President Clinton,

Well, this is it. The culmination of four years of hard work with four more hopefully to come.

People have been asking me for a while now why I'm a supporter of yours. Yes, I'm a registered Democrat, but that's not the whole story. I've been listening, watching, paying attention — I even took notes during the debates (nice job, by the way). Your ideas, your plans, your record of work thus far— these are the reasons I'm giving you my vote. Not partisan ideology, not animosity toward your opponents, not some sort of vague allusion to arbitrary and particular "character issues" that may or may not be there.

I agree with your ideas more than your opponents'.

That's all. Plain and simple.

So I'm giving you my vote. I'm not casting it, but giving it. It's an important distinction, I think.

It's my vote after all. I earned it, it's mine. It was paid for by the blood of my foremothers and forefathers and handed down to me the day I turned 18. It's mine to do with what I will, and I'm giving it to you.

But before I do, I want to make sure there are some things understood between us.

My vote is part of a trust, an agreement between the two of us. I agree to make my voice heard and to keep my nose clean, pay my taxes and to actively participate in our democratic process on multiple levels.

Your end of the bargain gets a little more complicated. You've made promises and introduced plans, and I'm going to hold you to trying to make them reality.

Try. That's all I'm asking. I'm enough of a realist to understand that politics, by its nature, is about compromise, and that some of the plans and promises may not become reality in the forms originally proposed. That's life. But I'm going to demand that you try.

You've said many times during your two Presidential campaigns that you want my vote. Well, there are some things I want in return.

I want to know that I've got a good chance to be able to put my degree to use and that I'll be able to have a place to go to work every morning.

I want to make sure that government programs such as Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security are not only working well, but will be in place long enough to help take care of my parents, and that the groundwork will be laid for the programs to continue functioning well into the next century.

I want the U.S. educational system to be brought not just up to date, but propelled forward into the next millennium. That means starting at the pre–school level. A lot of the talk has been concentrating on education only at the secondary level. Education doesn't start after you graduate high school, and it doesn't end after college. We ought to have the best equipped, best staffed and most adequately funded schools possible. It's shocking that a good number of college graduates can't name Germany's allies during World War II. We can do better.

When I give you my vote, I'm asking that you look out for us as a whole. The country. And we're going to ask you to take care of things for us. We need someone to mind the store. We need someone to allay our fears, so that we can sleep well at night.

When I give you my vote I want to be able to feel confident that you're looking out for our best interests. Even if that means stepping on a few toes and putting aside your personal feelings.

I want to be able to know that we're not going to rush into an armed conflict without considering everything. I don't want to see any more blood spilt in vain.

I want you to try and make this a place where we put aside our stupid, petty problems to actually get down to business and get some work accomplished. I want to see a place where everyone is given a fair shake and an equal chance.

I want to see this country become an equal partner in a global community, and not a jingoistic bully imposing its own self–righteous sense of pax Americana onto the rest of the planet.

There's more of course, but I think you get the idea.

It's a tall order, I know. I also understand that none of this is going to happen overnight. It probably won't all come to pass in the next four years, either. If we try, if we constantly try to improve ourselves, that's a move in the right direction. A nation constantly bettering itself is perhaps the best we can hope for in a country of this size and diversity. Even a meager half step forward has got to be better than any amount of backward motion, don't you think?

So, I want you to try. Do your best. I'm asking you to at least do that. I can't fault somebody if they've honestly given their all.

So, I give you my trust, I give you my hope.
I give you my vote.
Please don't let me down.

Costume foolery

C. Taylor Conner

To my readers,

I can't lie to you, friends. I'm about to write one of those columns. My train of thought pulled into the station, and the only passenger was a giant cliche. If you didn't read Brad Davidson's piece yesterday, this exercise may seem just wholly unoriginal. If you did, could you please just pretend for 70 or so lines like you didn't? Many thanks.

Captain Kirk. The Wolfman. A Stormtrooper. You.

Yep, I've been all of 'em in my hallowed Halloween career. Back in the day, we all used to enjoy the ritual: the Toys 'R' Us stampede to snag that last cheap plastic Tron get–up so we too could enter the computer age with Bruce Boxleitner; the mall holiday store rush to grab those hot– selling Sloth–from–Goonies masks; or the last–minute attic dash to search out your parents' old vetements so you could be the kid in big clothes who trips a lot.

But then we get older. We dread the little bastards showing up on our doorsteps asking for candy. We start to understand Albert Belle's driving instincts. We think about throwing laxative pills in the candy corn we give out.

Nothing's free, you little freaks, we think. And how are you ever going to get a job dressed like that?

It's time for us to loosen up and get back to basics. No, that doesn't mean risking circulation cut–off by trying to fit into your fifth–grade Adidas sneakers in a desperate attempt to recreate your beloved Run–DMC costume.

We need to make our inner children smile, hold hands and teach the world to sing.

More specifically, we need to reflect in our new costumes the interests we have at this juncture in our lives as young adults and college students. As promised in my official opening cop–out, here are a few suggestions:

Bar clones: For guys, find fifty plaid shirts. Wear all of them at once. Next, buy a hat bearing the logo of an institution you don't attend. Finally, purchase a pair of over– priced corduroys that you couldn't have given away five years ago. All set.

For the ladies, dig up your baby clothes, more makeup than a high school production of The Elephant Man and all of your pride (which you'll soon discard).

If you and your friends achieve these looks adeptly, you should all appear identical.

Administrators: Wear your best suit. Soil tie or shirt slightly with spills for best replication of a six–Beefeater martini lunch. To top off the illusion, when asked even the most basic questions, give a maddeningly irrelevant and brutally long–winded answer. Or just lie.

Job interviewers: The simplest of all costumes, but unfortunately the heaviest as well. All it requires you to do is carry around a desk and chair. When approached by curious students, simply sit behind the desk, ask them what they can offer you, and then kick back grinning a spit–eating grin that all but says, "You will never, ever, ever get this job."

Note: For those who like this idea, but suffer from back problems, you can be a financial aid office worker, thereby eliminating the need for the desk and chair. Simply replace said props with a teller's window, and replace the phrase "this job" with "free from loan debts."

A philosophy or sociology major: Just be a flake all day. Students will know what you're supposed to be in the metaphysical scheme that determines our social dynamic. See, it's easy.

A track runner with a groin pull: Gentleman, this is finally the opportunity you've been waiting for — you can touch your crotch in public 'til the cows come home. However, to get the proper look of someone who emerges from daily 59– degree whirlpool soaks numb–assed and cold–water shrunken, see me.

Sorry. Scratch that last image. No pun intended.

Well, I'm off to write next week's column, which will strive for originality, as will future efforts. It's all about Bob Dole being old and Bill Clinton smoking weed. In a couple of weeks, I'll write about what Thanksgiving means to me, and why it's important to be thankful. And you'll all be looking out for my Christmas column about the travails of holiday shopping. And what about wild New Year's adventures, and why Valentine's Day is so romantic, and why we should drink on St. Patty's Day, and...

Chris Conner, Managing Editor — Fearless (1994).With the notably ghastly exception that is Green Card, Peter Weir's track record in Tinseltown is one of the smoothest. Fearless, went largely unnoticed, quite a shame for such a rich and haunting work. Rosie Perez may have snagged the Best Supporting Actress nom but this is Jeff Bridges' piece de resistance.

Jeremy Brothers, Arts Associate — Kicking and Screaming (1995). Someday it's going to happen, it's inevitable — graduation. A terrifyingly comic tale of what happens when you refuse to leave your college town after you graduate. The apathy and insanity are delivered with inspired performances from Christopher Eigeman and Josh Hamilton. A must see for residents of Amherst.

Seema Gangatirkar, Arts Associate — The Scarlet Pimpernel (1982). This flick has got everything: passion, romance, betrayal and intrigue. Anthony Andrews stars as the swashbuckling hero determined to save aristocrats from Madame la Guillotine. There's nothing sexier than a man in satin and lace.

Philip O'Brien

All roads to filmmaking do not lead to Hollywood. Take a quick look at the often ignored independent film scene in the Valley, and you will see that great filmmakers are among us. Philip O'Brien and Liane Brandon are two examples of independent filmmakers who have connections to the University of Massachusetts. While O'Brien is just making his name in the competitive industry, Brandon has become a leading figure in the independent film scene.

Philip O'Brien

Philip O'Brien takes his ideas for film from life. O'Brien, who graduated from the University of Massachusetts in 1994, pulled together details from his life to create his award–winning film, Asylum.

"I guess I look for things in my environment that I can pull in and make stories from," he said. In Asylum, he drew upon knowledge from his father and grandfather's tow truck and repair services to create a character who inherited a towing business.

O'Brien's fascination with film began early on, though it wasn't clear at first where he would be going with film.

"I did a lot of animated things. Then I came here and I really didn't know what I was going to do. I didn't really consider filmmaking an option," he said. "Then I took a few classes and I started to get into [film] again."

Asylum took him two years and $12,000 to produce.

"I was the cameraman, I edited, everything," O'Brien said. At the time, video stores in the valley

Seema Gangatirkar

The Pioneer Valley is a cultural mecca. Though tiny in size compared to a major city, it's huge in what it has to offer. Countless lectures, concerts, films and art galleries open in the Valley everyday. We are privy to a variety of cultural events, and are given many opportunities to explore more about the arts.

The Valley houses a wide assortment of places to explore its cultural resources — among these are video stores. This area has some of the best video stores in the region, and each one offers something different. From mega Hollywood blockbusters, to smaller art house films, students can find exactly what they are looking for in at least one of the Valley's video stores.

• The biggest conglomerate and also the most recent addition to the Valley is Blockbuster Video. Its blue and yellow awning graces the Stop & Shop strip mall in South Hadley. While some criticize Blockbuster because of corporate nature, it offers many conveniences.

If Hollywood glam and first rate releases are what you desire, than Blockbuster is the store for you. More often than not, they shelve 15 or more copies of new releases.

They also have a fairly large collection of older movies, and generally keep one or two copies of each. Their foreign section is far from impressive, unless you want to rent a so– called "popular" import like My Life as a Dog or Belle Du Jour. Blockbuster also does not stock anything rated above "R," so forget trying to rent the big screen version of Showgirls

festival returns to NOHO

Lisa M. Oliveri

In the grand tradition of Cannes, Venice, New York and Toronto, Northampton has joined the ranks of the Film Festival Circuit.

Sort of...

While the Second Annual Northampton Film Festival doesn't have the glamour and glitz of some of the major film festivals, the Valley has something far more precious.

"The festival's theme is of the art and craft of film and video production. In a way, we have a very competitive festival because we offer workshops on screenwriting and film criticism as well as screening independent films," said Dee DeGeiso, who serves on the festival's Board of Directors.

The weekend's festivities begin Friday with the first Film & Video Expo in the area. The first of many of the festival's free offerings, the expo will be presented in the performance space of the Northampton Center for the Arts. Offerings will include representatives from film and video production houses, editing studios, booksellers with film and video–related titles, computer animators, movie memorabilia vendors, film and video organizations and the State Film Office.

Tomorrow evening, the festival continues with an opening reception at the Words and Pictures Museum. The special guest at this reception will be Academy Award–winning special effects master, Douglas Trumbull.

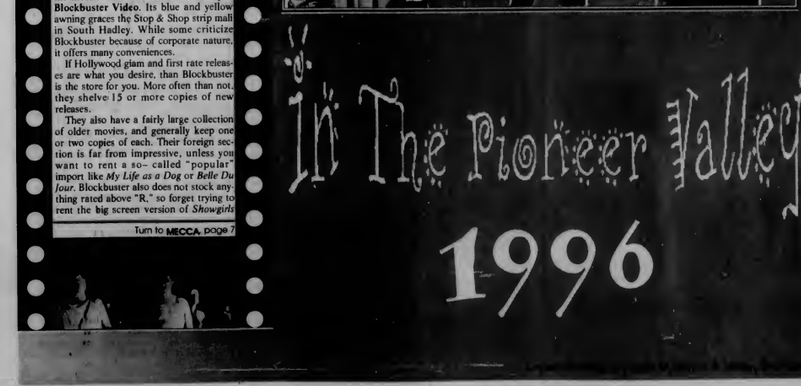
Jeremy Brothers

Despite its size, the Pioneer Valley still has one of the most vibrant film scenes in the northeast. Not only can one see all the recent Hollywood releases, but the number of independent and imported films is equally astonishing. Countless filmmakers have spoken throughout the Five College system. This weekend's Northampton Film Festival is a prime example of the magnitude of culture the valley contains.

The number and specific styles of the Valley's theaters make it possible for this area to have this great diversity. The fact that the Valley has so many different kinds of theaters allows a wide range of distributors to bring their movies to the area. Obviously, competition is a factor in the success of the community's movie houses; however, this has forced the opposing theaters to cater to more specific audiences and film styles.



University of Massachusetts Professor Barton Byg, a film historian and instructor of a class on German Cinema, explained why the area is so special.

"What's unique about the Valley is the concentration of different kinds of filmmakers coming to the area and showing their work," he said.

Although not a native of the area, Byg expressed how the film scene of the Valley is comparable to that of Boston. As a result of independent theaters in metropolitan areas closing down, the Valley still strives with culture, allowing a variety of filmmakers to come to the area and promote their art.

The AMC Mt. Farms Theater in Hadley has been in the area since 1975.

O'Brien was attending school full–time and was working to pay for both school and the film. An Arts Council grant helped O'Brien with some of the expenses.

"Any money I got, I channeled into the [film]," he said. "I had to work a lot."

After the movie was completed, O'Brien tried his luck with film festivals.

"I sent it out to festivals and it was well received at a few," he said. Asylum snagged the top award at the Five College Film Festival.

Currently, O'Brien is rubbing elbows with filmmakers like Michael Moore (Roger and Me) and Kevin Smith (Clerks) as he works on a show for MTV called "Rough Cuts," a documentary on independent filmmakers.

For anyone who has ever had the desire to make a film, O'Brien offered some simple advice.

"You just got to go out and do it," he said.

Liane Brandon
Award–winning independent filmmaker Liane Brandon took an unorthodox route to a film career. Brandon, a professor in the education department at the University of Massachusetts, started out as a stuntwoman.

"I had done stunts before I did films," she said. "Then I got involved in teaching and politics, the women's movement and antiwar activities."

Brandon's interest in social issues and teaching eventually led to a film career.

"One way to solve problems is to do something about it," Brandon said.

Through filmmaking, Brandon was able to draw attention to issues she felt needed to be addressed.

"I was making films because the medium was so powerful," she said. "I made them because I had a message that was important to get out. That was my motivation."

Getting the message out though wasn't easy. Brandon found that distributors were unwilling to distribute her films.

"[The films] were considered too feminist," Brandon said, adding that the sentiment in 1972 was that "women's issues would not last two years."

In response to the difficulties incurred in trying to get her films out, Brandon co–founded New Day Films.

At the time, New Day was the first group of independent filmmakers in the country. Since its inception, New Day has grown from four filmmakers to 53 nationwide, and represents 110 films.

Brandon said that the filmmakers have been together for 25 years. The co–op's success can be measured by the fact that New Day Films are attracting audiences.

Two of Brandon's films, Anything You Want To Be and Betty Tells Her Story, will be shown at the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston on Nov. 23 and Dec. 15.

When it comes to what differentiates quality films from the rest, Brandon has a ready answer:

"Good films are a combination of the way you use the medium plus the message you're trying to get across," she said.

Visual Effects Oscar, will be have a special screening at the Academy of Music. The Festival's producers have temporarily installed a Dolby Stereo sound system for this rare event. Trumbull will be on hand to answer questions after the film about both 2001 and his work up to now. Since 2001, Trumbull has gone on to work on such modern–day classics as Blade Runner and Close Encounters of the Third Kind.

Saturday will offer various screenings of independent films at the Academy as well as at Stoddard Hall, located on the campus of Smith College. The films vary both in content and length, ranging from shorts weighing in at five minutes to features at 88 minutes.

That evening, the festival will present the four awards: Northern Arts' Best of the Fest Critic's Award; The Advocate Newspapers' Best Use of Film/Video as Journalism; The Kodak Vision Award and Tough Kid Productions' Emerging Young Filmmaker Award.

After the awards are presented, "An Evening with Harvey Fierstein" will begin. The award–winning playwright and actor will address the audience and take questions, in addition to a screening of several of his works. Fierstein can also be found in such film hits as Bullets over Broadway, Independence Day, and the adaptation of his own play, Torch Song Trilogy.

Sunday begins with a brunch at Spoleto featuring Eric Mabius, co–star of Welcome to the Dollhouse, as well as having Fierstein on hand to take questions.

The world premier of Vétalay, the new film from Ken Burns, will also be screened Sunday. Burns, creator of the popular Civil War and Baseball series, was one of the honorees at last year's festival.

"We were very happy with how last year's festival worked out. It was great. People seemed to be very happy too. People felt it was accessible having everything within walking distance," DeGeiso said.

The festival will end with a tribute to Hampshire College's Joan Braderman at the CFA. Braderman, a internationally recognized video artist with pieces in the permanent collections of the Museum of Modern Art in New York and the Centre Pompidou in Paris, will be on hand to answer questions and screen her 1993 video, Joan Sees Stars, a humorous commentary on the many ways in which popular culture has affected our lives.

there. However, they do offer some non–rated films.

From my own observation, Blockbuster doesn't cater to college students with their prices. They don't offer any specials, and their videos are a bit pricey at $3.35 for a feature–length film. They also carry an extensive previously– viewed video collection at affordable prices.

While Blockbuster doesn't have the homey feel of some of the other stores in the area, you can't beat it for selection. And if they don't say your name when you check–out ('Your video is due back by Monday evening, Lisa"), you get a free video.

• In my opinion, the best video store in the Amherst area is Video To Go on Route 9 by Amherst College. It houses by far the best selection of videos. Whether searching for the latest Antonio Banderas flick, or the Georgio Moreoder remake of Metropolis, Video to Go aims to please.

If you are a film buff, then this store will impress. Their video library is categorized to provide easy access to choosing a film. Their videos are grouped not only by genre, but also by directors and actors.

Price–wise they are also a bit steep — new releases are $3 per night and older videos can be kept for two evenings. But every time you shop at Stop & Shop, clip the coupon on the back of your receipt — it allows you to get two videos for the price of one.

The most impressive feature of Video to Go is their wide selection of hard–to–find videos. They stock many videos that are out of print, and also have a huge international film section, categorized by country.

Video to Go also caters to the inexperienced film watcher, since the employees who work there are very friendly and extremely knowledgeable. If you need to order a copy of Girls in Uniform for your German film class, the workers will point you in the right direction.

• Of the same caliber of Video to Go is Pleasant Street Video, located next to the theater in Northampton. Its set up is similar — the videos are grouped by genre and director. This is another great place for hard–to–find videos. They have an extensive import, independent and avant garde library.

"I think we are an anecdote to the chains," said Dana Gentes, the manager and part–owner of Pleasant Street. "We take chances on bizarre films."

According to Gentes, Pleasant Street stocks more out–of– the–ordinary videos — they are willing to take a chance on films that are not mainstream. Another great feature they practice is a request list where patrons can offer their opinions as to what videos they would like to see on the shelves. If they get enough requests for a specific film, Gentes said, the store will try to order it.

Pleasant Street has many specials throughout the week, including two–for–one days Monday through Wednesday. Thursday is $1 off all videos, so price–wise you can't beat them. They also special–order videos, and deal with many used places and rare video specialists.

The other co–owner, Richard Pini, runs the theater next door, so Pleasant Street often has specials in conjunction with the featured film of that week. In a few weeks, the theater will be showing Delicatessen, so be sure to look for a City of Lost Children display.

With their expansion, which included The Hampshire Six Theater, the AMC consistently has the most affordable ticket prices in the valley. The films are geared to the more conventional Hollywood releases. With their size, the AMC can offer the largest selections of movies, large screens and decent sound systems.

The AMC has also been a major supporter of the upcoming film festival. By having special screenings of The Rocky Horror Picture Show, they helped contribute to the festival by donating the proceeds from the event. The theater is also excellent for budget–managing students wanting to see movies at an affordable price. With a valid I.D., students can view a film at the AMC for less than the price of an average video rental.

The Pleasant Street Theater in Northhampton is the most charming theater in the area. It contains a true artistic quality and a cozy viewing atmosphere. This theater is everything that the multi–plex isn't, and is designed for the quintessential film buff. Also, the fact that they have two screens allows them to have more variety than your average movie house.

The Pleasant Street Theater has been in Northampton for 20 years, and is responsible for showing many of the finest independent and foreign features.

"This sort of theater might not exist in too many other areas," owner Richard Pini said.

This deals with the concentration of the type of audience within the Valley, many of whom are associated with the academic world and understand the importance of film as a medium of communication and entertainment.

The Pleasant Street also screens cult classic films, such as Faster Pussycat Kill Kill and Blade Runner, every weekend. This allows viewers to watch older favorites in a traditional movie theater environment. They also have a special morning matinee on Wednesdays.

The Academy of Music is also located in downtown Northampton, and is aesthetically the most impressive theater in the valley. Originally designed as a music hall, a screen was later added, enabling the theater to bring more artistic films to the area. The Academy also has a large seating capacity, making it one of the more comfortable theaters. With a quick turnover rate, the Academy is able to screen a large quantity of films, usually specializing in international cinema and bigger independent features. The Academy serves as the homebase for this weekend's Northampton Film Festival (see related story).

The Amherst Cinema is located next to the Fleet Bank in downtown Amherst. The Amherst Cinema contains an equally spacious theater as The Academy, allowing for a pleasurable viewing experience. The Cinema specializes in screening second–run films that have often played previously at The Academy.

This service is excellent for giving viewers a second chance if they missed a certain film they wanted to see. The Amherst Cinema does screen a nice variety of film genres, ranging from Hollywood to independently–made, and has a less specific concentration than most of the other theaters in the area. The Amherst Cinema is also known for having the lowest concession prices in the valley.

Each of the valley's movie theaters has created their own uniqueness allowing them each to adequately co–exist. Through their determination to represent the Pioneer Valley and its continuously growing culture, we, the viewers, are in an excellent position to experience the complete range of global cinema.

a fabulous musical score and the most beautiful, erotic love scene between Sarandon and Deneuve.

Mike Burke, Arts & Living Editor — Slacker (1991). What other movie has ever discussed purchasing Madonna's pap smear?

Henry Brier, Ed-op Writer — Cape Fear (1991). Directed by Martin Scorsese, this film is great not only because it's suspenseful and has amazing cinematography, but mostly because Robert DeNiro distinguishes himself as a true bad-ass.

Elizabeth Brown, Photography Editor — Love and Death (1975). This is one of Woody Allen's best films because the humor is so delicious and his final monologue is brilliant and completely true. "You should definitely look into it..."

Chris Stamm, Sports co-editor — Happy Gilmore (1996) is the story of a cagey young athlete who enters the world of professional sports, not for the love of the game, not for the fame, but to help out his grandmother. Oh, and he tries to kill a guy with his hockey skate, bonus.

Pete Servais, Advertising Manager — Bloodsport (1987). This is your basic all-around kick-butt movie. It encompasses all brands of martial arts with Jean-Claude Van Damme ultimately kicking the most butt. Not much on plot but heavy on the intense fight scenes. When Harry Met Sally comes in a strong second, but that's another story, and I'm sober.

Laura Stock, News Associate — Much Ado About Nothing (1993). One of the best Shakespearian film adaptations. Kenneth Branagh and Emma Thompson are electric as Beatrice and Benedick, delivering the Bard's blank verse like a RSC pros. Keanu Reeves can't even ruin this literary delight.

Nicole Cournoyer, Ed-op Associate — 12 Monkeys (1995). This makes it because six billion people die, time travel is neat, Bruce Willis is a hotty and Brad Pitt is hysterical. You'll be quoting insane ramblings and moving your hands in weird jerky motions for weeks afterwards.

Sean Horgen, computer whiz — In the Name of the Father (1993). One of the few mainstream movies that actually gives a realistic representation of the troubles in Northern Ireland. It breaks through the stereotypical British media spin on the situation and shows some of the true victims. Daniel Day Lewis kicks ass!

Tara MK Connelly, Collegian columnist — My Fair Lady (1964). Audrey Hepburn is the epitome of chic and Rex Harrison is by far at his best as Prof. Henry Higgins. A classic musical with a magnificent score that many overlook because they just can't deal with people bursting into song and dancing while buying flowers.

Daniel Bodah, Arts Writer — Network (1976). I just saw this classic, starring William Holden and Faye Dunaway, for the first time. In this hysterical and sharp satire on the influence of the media, a news anchor turns into the ranting "Mad Poet of the Airwaves" and the "Mao Tse-tung Hour" gets a 30 share. A comedy with great acting and drama under the surface.

Justin Daniel Smith, Arts Writer — The Wild Bunch (1969). The violentest movie ever! "Bloody Sam" Peckinpah at his best, as a group of outlaws including William Holden, Ben Johnson and Ernest Bognine (hell, yeah) thwart evil Mexican banditos in this western classic.

Bob Dunn, Collegian Columnist — Broadcast News (1988). Not only funny and timely with great performances all around from William Hurt, Albert Brooks and Holly Hunter, but raises serious questions about the pedestal on which we put our news anchors.

Dan Levenson, Associate News Editor — Billy Madison (1994). This excellent work of art is the quintessential humor film. Combining the stunning wit of Adam Sandler with the incredible acting of a giant penguin, this movie is sure to delight people of all ages, drunk or sober.

Luke Meredith, Associate Sports Editor — Cool Hand Luke (1967). I was named after this movie, and I'd like to think I take after Paul Newman's character a little bit. Not the coolness, but the public drunkenness and the prison record. Seriously, Newman is the man, and the carwashing scene? Aye, Carumba!

Alycia Hines, Business Manager — Sleepless in Seattle (1993). A tearjerker with a funny twist. A woman becoming obsessed with a man she's only heard talking to a radio psychiatrist. I wouldn't be surprised if this happened to me! I gave this movie two thumbs up!

Beth McCarthy, News Associate — Crimes of the Heart (1986). Yes. A chick flick. That is, if you're a bit of a twisted chick. The three main characters are definitely not all there. If black comedy appeals to your funny bones, this is definitely the film for you.

Matt Wurtzel, Ed-op Associate — Dr. Strangelove (1964). Stanley Kubrick is quite possibly the greatest director ever. This masterpiece makes all other comedies pale in comparison. Here's the basic plot: the world is at the brink of Nuclear Holocaust thanks to a crazy U.S. general named Jack D. Ripper who fears that women are trying to steal his essence. It does not get better than this.

Raghuram Vadarevu, News Associate — The Shawshank Redemption (1994). I don't know why I like it. I just do so you should go see it.

Bradley Skaught, Arts Writer — That Darn Cat (1965). It's really, really cute.

Sarah Kimmei, Jewish Affairs Editor — Billy Madison (1994). This incredibly quotable flick contains both pee- your-pants humor and the voluptuous bod of Veronica Vaughn. Whoever said romance was dead never went out with the "smartest man alive." Don't just rent it, memorize it, live it, breathe it, be Billy. It's as cool as a Snack Pack!

Adam Levine, Arts Writer — Ed Wood (1994). The coolest Hollywood parody ever. Tim Burton's homage to the schlock director focuses on his extraordinary career as "the worst filmmaker ever" and his weakness for wearing women's angora sweaters.

Jamie Sinsheimer, GLBT Editor — The Dark Crystal (1983). A great film for both children and adults, this film is one that I really enjoyed as a child as well as now. It has a lovely story and is accompanied by really cool Muppets made by the master himself, Jim Henson.

Adam Diugacz, Arts Writer — The Untouchables (1987). One of the best gangster flicks of all time. Sean Connery shines and no one will forget the speech he gives to Kevin Costner in the temple about capturing Al Capone. Great action, great dialogue in a movie that doesn't slow down.

G. Tony Morse, Production Manager — Excalibur (1982). The is the only Arthurian movie worth mentioning, it remains remarkably similar to Mallory's classic Morte D'Arthur, and covers the majority of the legend without dragging endlessly on.

Michael J. Nam, Sports Writer — Clerks (1994). For anyone who has ever worked in retail, this film captures the sheer pain of a minimum wage job. Particularly endearing to me because of its New Jersey origins. Basically it states that customers are evil, ignorant villains while the clerk is an underpaid, tragic character. A really vindicating film.

Bryan Schwartzman, Jewish Affairs Editor — Dead Poets Society (1989). Here was a film which truly encourages non-conformist behavior, living life to the fullest, and adding back some zip to the drone of everyday existence. The tragedy that occurs in the movie precipitates a major change in Ethan Hawke's character!

Suzanne Barber, Collegian Cool Chick — Better Off Dead (1985).

Watch this movie while eating french fries, french dressing, french bread and no drink: Peru. I guarantee you'll laugh, and you will identify with Jon Cusack as a tragic hero who led a generation of teenagers to conquer their fears, follow their dreams... and shower with their socks on.

Fashion kings & queens on VH1

When America tuned into VH1's "Fashion Week" last week, they saw seven days devoted to the most stunning supermodels, the biggest designers and the most popular fashions of the past year.

Highlights from last year's event were shown amongst the many other programs that focused not only on the hottest kicks, but on those who created them and the models who wore them. Other specials prided themselves on how various magazines dealt with showing the world the latest looks. The fashion editors were asked their opinions on what they believed to be the best and worst looks of 1996.

The intended highlight of the week's events was the VH1 1996 Fashion Awards show, which aired Friday at 9 p.m. Overall, the event was dry and dull. The exciting portions were few and far between.

Lauren Lobik

An abundance of musicians, television and film stars, models and designers paraded throughout the event. The cast was led by "Melrose Place" superstar Heather Locklear, who served as the host.

The show began with a short clip of what Locklear looked like in her bimbo years; later she was referred to herself as a fashion maverick. Lo'klear lived up to this title by switching gowns after each commercial break. On one entrance, she relived her bimbo days by wearing nothing more than a see- through, black lace, extremely snug slip.

If that wasn't enough, the first announcer, also appearing in a see-through number, was RuPaul. His black string bikini underwear was noticed more than the actual gown.

The true highlight of the evening's events was definitely the musical segment. Bryan Adams' performance stood out the most. He serenaded a group of female models as they pranced around in the latest style of evening gowns. Leading the procession was Kate Moss wearing a red, slim-fitting, cut-out gown. Moss looked stunning, as she should have since she received the honor of Female Model of the Year. As this display came to an end, the words sung by Bryan Adams, "The only thing that looks good on you is me," lingered in the air. Keep dreaming, Bryan. You looked like something the cat dragged in.

In other award presentations, Mark Vanderloogiven won Male Model of the Year; he was kind enough to thank his parents and agent. Men's Wear Designer of the Year went to Tom Ford for Gucci. Best Second Collection didn't go home with DKNY or Calvin Klein, but rather with Miu Miu. Wondering what exactly is a second collection? It's the cheaper version of the designers' runway fashions. These clothes can be found at such stores as Filene's and Lord & Taylor's.

Yet another award presented was for Best Personal Style in a female. The nominees up for this honor were Sharon Stone, Madonna, Courtney Love, Kate Moss and Gwyneth Paltrow. Last, but definitely not least, Paltrow won. She arrived on stage in a tight-fitting, black sheath dress topped off with a simple bun in her hair. This was a well-deserved prize for a classy lady.

The 1996 VH1 fashion week is now a memory, with the awards show being a much less memorable event. We can only wonder what next year will bring not only to the fashion world, but to its audience.

Kayaking the rapids of daunting waters

Fly into the air with shooting sprays of foamy river water through the steep hills of the Berkshires on a kayak. Leave the pit of your stomach behind as adrenaline pumps through your body with butterflies of fear and excitement on the Zoar Gap.

In order to conquer the unruly waters of the Zoar Gap, learn all of the tricky maneuvers of kayaking with the Outing Club on Friday nights from 7–10 p.m. at the Curry Hicks Pool.

For less than $5, you can receive expert kayak training on kayaks supplied by the Outing Club until the end of the fall semester. In just one three-hour clinic, participants will learn the keys to Eskimo rolling as they test their water skills and learn the art of "hip flexing."

Alfreco Meals with Liz Anderson

"The clinics are very relaxed and the instructors are very helpful," said Dan Glauser, the Outing Club kayaking instructor. "However, in order to master kayaking, people have to go out and use the skills we teach them."

Once you have completed the clinic, test your kayaking skills on the raging waves of the Zoar Gap.

The starting point or "put-in" of the Zoar Gap is 1.25 miles above the River Road Bridge and the Electric Company Roadside Park. These are excellent spots for picnicking or a great place to start your kayaking adventure if you want to avoid the Zoar Gap.

Take a course in kayaking with the Outing Club at the Curry Hicks Pool, do the homework on the Deerfield River and let the Zoar Gap be your final exam.

To reach this section of the Deerfield River take Highway 91 north to Exit 26 and get on to Rte. 2, which runs through the Town of Charlmont. like Rte. 2 to the River Road to Zoar at the east end of the Mohawk Trail Bridge.

For more information about the kayaking clinic call the Outing club at 545-3131.

Going out with a bang at last electric show

By Daniel Bodah
Collegian Staff

CORDELIA'S DAD
Iron Horse Music Hall
Oct. 29

Locally-founded folksters and rock stars Cordelia's Dad packed an appreciative audience into Northampton's Iron Horse Music Hall Tuesday night. Fans came from Boston, and at least one from as far as Europe, to witness the band's last-ever electric set and taste the acoustic fruit of their new direction.

Starting alone in a plaintive voice, guitarist and lead singer Tim Eriksen belted out one of the shape-note songs that seem to be an emerging influence for the band. It was a great intro to the night, and the band picked it up with "George Collins," followed by the hysterical "Old Spencer Rifle." This song is a raunchy tune about a boy showing his girlfriend how to use his "rifle." At the culmination of the lesson, the girl's mother caught the pair and John "got off with a double load and he shot at her off-handed."

The band continued on a mission to play "songs from Arkansas about sex," perhaps in honor of our President, Cath Oss, who plays mountain dulcimer, bass and accordion, picked up the lead vocals for "Lay Lay Over Me Do." It was particularly effective that Oss took the vocals for a number of the songs in which a man tells about having sex with an unconscious or unwilling woman: "Queen Jane," an achingly beautiful and sad song, tells of a brother raping a girl without knowing she's his sister, and "May Blooming Field" chills with overtones of lust and murder.

Drummer Peter Irvine and violinist Laura Risk should both be noted as excellent instrumentalists. Risk swung from soft and sure passages to wild, quirky string-rants, while anyone who has ever tried playing a bodhran (Irish hand drum) will know it's nowhere near as easy as Irvine makes it look.

In many ways Cordelia's Dad is highly promising as an acoustic band. Their performance is casual and homey, and they pick interesting material. The band also works well as a team, with no one dominant personality.

After the break, the band took — for the last time in North America — to their electric instruments. I have to admit that the electric material on the studio albums has never really wowed me. Although interesting, it has never really been as powerful as the acoustic songs. Seeing these songs performed live changed all of that — the band crashed through over a dozen tunes, sounding totally transformed. You'd probably never guess that some of these tunes are old shape-note hymns or Civil War songs, as they have been transformed into loud, dark alternative rock.

Irvine dealt with the drums heavy-handedly, easily propelling the music through quiet, evocative verses and into wild, twisted bridges. Oss' bass-playing stayed strongly present in the foreground throughout. Eriksen's guitar style and stage presence definitely fronted this electric manifestation of the band, with intriguingly wild solos that he seemed unable to stand still for, opting instead to leap up and down.

A couple of dozen fans filled the limited space in front of the stage, dancing and swaying through the discordantly melodic verses and breaking into abandoned chaos during the raucous breaks. High points included "Brother Judson" and a full-force assault on "Idumea" that could have raised hymnist author Billings up from the grave and taught him how to slam-dance his way to heaven.

The band encored with the crowd-pleaser "Down By the Riverside," requests for which they've refused over the last several years, and "Johnny is Gone for a Soldier." By evening's end, it was tangibly sad that this would be their last electric set — until Irvine hinted that they will keep it up under another name.

So if you see Cordelia's Dad playing again, go expecting an evening of crafty folk rife with sex and violence. But be sure to watch as well for what should be one of the country's top rock acts, coming soon under a new name.

Bakers cook up special dishes; Seals accused of theft

RCA/Victor Records, a longtime jazz label going way back into the swing era of the '30s and '40s, has recently blessed jazz shelves with a few re-releases of 1960s sessions by Chet Baker and one of Duke Ellington's favorite sidemen, Johnny Hodges. A fairly upbeat album from one of the kings of "cool" jazz in the early '50s, Baker's The Italian Sessions (1962), serves up a healthy dish of tunes penned by mostly others, with the exception of the serene "Ballata In Forma Di Blues," written by Sessions pianist Amadeo Tommassi. A lively version of "Well You Needn't," Thelonious Monk's standard, features the classic theme with just unmuted trumpet, bass, piano and drums stated matter-of-factly. The greatest credit to this disc is the presence of Belgian guitarist Rene Thomas.

Thomas plays bluesy jazz guitar with tremendous flash on Charlie Parker's "Barbados," and Sonny Rollins' "Pent-up House." The Italian Sessions' two best tracks. Baker's trumpet gets an unusual fuel kick in Parker and Rollins' songs as well as on Oscar Pettiford's "Blues In The Closet." On Italian Sessions, though, it is Thomas who steals the spotlight.

"Johnny Hodges! Johnny Hodges! Johnny Hodges!" Duke Ellington used to introduce his favorite alto saxophonist, who was in Ellington's orchestra for more than 40 years, saying his name three different ways, playing with the way Hodges has many different flavors and feels to his playing. This is clear on Triple Play, originally released by RCA/Victor in 1967. There are quite a few other Ellington Orchestra musicians on this album, including Roy Eldridge, Paul Gonsalves and Ray Nance. Great ensemble chemistry graces this album, especially on the openers "Take 'Em Off Parts I & II" and "For Jammers Only." "On The Way Up," even has a big-band urban blues sound to it.

"No, No Baby"... Son Seals proves he is no Albert King on Live Spontaneous Combustion.

As Hodges was never truly a fast, flashy player, he illustrates on the Ray Noble standard, "The Very Thought Of You," why his ballad-playing abilities on the alto sax have always been highly favored, as they are deep and sensual.

Coming into the present day, Rykodisk/Grammavision, on the same day they released the superb Medeski, Martin & Wood album, Shack-Man, also issued newcomer Myra Melford's avante-garde album, The Same River, Twice. Melford, a pianist who embraces Chopin as well as the chaotic bursts of Cecil Taylor, has written an album that picks up and drops rhythms and meters like a scavenger.

Her Band of five explore musical space on such odd tracks as the almost 25-minute "The Large Ends The Way," "Changes I & II" and "Crush." That last song is quite a study, with the band falling in slowly to Melford's minor- key, classical-influenced piano intro, soon featuring an outgoing sax solo, ominous cello solo and intricate sub- melodies.

Drummer Ginger Baker, best known for his work in the 1960s with Eric Clapton in the short-lived bands Cream and Blind Faith, is back and drumming after the farm-house tumble injury which became the title of this album, Falling Off The Roof (Atlantic). This album features the same all- star trio of Baker, guitarist Bill Frisell and bassist Charlie Haden who also worked on Baker's critically-acclaimed 1994 work, Going Back Home.

Offset production (drums too close, bass too inaudible) plague the first five or six songs of Falling, but nothing can be said against the playing. Baker's percussive practices always surprise, and Frisell's eerie guitar sounds dance with one's ears, especially on the best track, "Sunday," which even presents a rare, but blissful, bass solo by Haden.

In the blues spectrum this week, guitarist Son Seals' Live Spontaneous Combustion (Alligator) is up on trial for plagiarism. He copies the style of former boss Albert King (for whom he was a drummer) so blatantly that he not only tries to play like King, but also to sing like him and present the same type of Memphis Stax/Volt sound of blues as King did. He does have some imaginative writing abilities, as heard here in "No, No Baby" and "Your Love," but the lifting is all too obvious to really believe he's been doing it successfully for over 20 years.

New Phillies manager has high hopes

By John F. Bonafatti
Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA — Terry Francona, named Philadelphia Phillies manager on Wednesday, said he wants his team to overachieve next season, which is probably the only way it will be any better than the past three seasons.

The Phillies, 190-231 since winning an unexpected NL pennant in 1993, will go with prospects in 1997, and aren't expected to spend large sums on veteran free agents who could provide immediate help. "It's not starting over, it's a different direction," Francona said after general manager Lee Thomas announced the selection in the Phillies clubhouse. "There are going to be a lot of young faces. There's going to be some rough spots."

Francona, who has a two-year deal that will pay him $600,000, is used to rough spots. He was third-base coach last season for the Detroit Tigers, who were 53-109.

"We knew on Sept. 1 we were four games behind you guys and we thought we could catch you," Francona said when asked if he was aware of the Phillies' 67-95 mark last season.

That didn't happen. The Phillies were 13-13 in September, but still finished with the National League's worst record.

Thomas chose Francona over former Phillies shortstop Larry Bowa, who will not return as third-base coach, and former Kansas City Royals manager Hal McRae, who may become the Phillies' hitting coach.

"I started looking at Terry three or four years ago when he was managing in the Arizona Fall League," Thomas said. "In the end, I just felt Terry Francona was the brightest guy, the guy who could have the (most) patience."

Thomas said a number of baseball people - and one basketball player - endorsed Francona. Michael Jordan played under Francona during a brief flirtation with minor-league baseball.

"He was very high on Terry Francona," said Thomas, who added that Jordan called to offer his opinion unsolicited. "He said, 'You've got a guy who can communicate with the players (and) who's organized and I'm giving you my vote.'"

Francona, 37, brings a lifetime of baseball knowledge but no major-league managerial experience to the job.

The son of former major leaguer Tito Francona, he was the first overall pick in the 1980 draft by the Montreal Expos.

But a serious knee injury during his rookie season with the Expos in 1982 made Francona a role player throughout the rest of a 10-year career that included stints with the Chicago Cubs, Cincinnati, Milwaukee and Cleveland.

"I wasn't playing, and at an early age, I started watching," he said. "I watched, I kept my eyes open and I listened." The fact that Francona spent so much of his time in the majors on the bench will help him relate to marginal players, he said. "I didn't play and when you're 24, 25, it's devastating when all of a sudden you're not playing," he said. "I think it also helps me to handle some players that are going through the same thing."

Patriots' Byars gets a chance to prove former coach wrong

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FOXBORO— Keith Byars is getting another shot at Jimmy Johnson.

A month ago, the 11-year veteran criticized the coach who dumped him. On Sunday, he'll play against the Miami Dolphins in his third game for the New England Patriots.

"I'm going to play the game at an emotional high anyway. It doesn't matter to me whether it's the Dolphins or the Jets or anybody," Byars said Wednesday. "I still can't lose my focus and make it a personal vendetta because the minute I do that, I'm not helping out my team."

He was the starting fullback in all 41 games he played for Miami the past three seasons. But rookie Stanley Pritchett won the job in training camp, and Byars switched to tight end, where he started the first four games.

But on Oct. 1, two weeks after his 130-game streak with at least one reception was snapped, Johnson released him.

"Jimmy wants a lot of followers. I've never been a follower in anything I've done," Byars said the next day. "Just because a person is the biggest and the loudest and has the most authority, that doesn't make him right all the time."

On Wednesday, Byars said he wasn't bitter.

"I was just truthful and sometimes the truth hurts," he said. "There's no revenge or anything like that in my heart. I have a lot of respect and feelings for the Dolphin players.

"I'm a New England Patriot now, and I'm out to beat anybody who is on our schedule."

Johnson said Wednesday he considers Byars a good football player but preferred a better blocker at tight end. He also noted that third-string tight end Frank Wainright is his long snapper. Patriots coach Bill Parcells was just happy to find a player of Byars experience and talent available. It hasn't taken him long to learn enough to contribute to two victories that have lifted the Patriots into a tie for the AFC East lead.

Parcells said Byars didn't make a single mental mistake in his 22 plays in a 27-9 win at Indianapolis. In Sunday night's 28-25 win over Buffalo, he led the Patriots with seven catches and recovered an onside kick with 22 seconds left.

His experience and leadership paid off when he called timeout before the kickoff after noticing the Patriots weren't set up properly. And when Steve Christie tried the onside kick, it was grabbed by Byars, who also played on the onside unit with Miami because of his sure hands.

"I wanted that ball," he said. "I'm like, 'please, kick it to me. I can handle it.' It was right at me, but you never know what way the ball's going to bounce."

Byars, who backs up fullback Sam Gash and plays in double tight-end formations, also was coveted by Parcells for his leadership, which could help a young team like the Patriots. "I think he can be a good influence," Parcells said.

Byars also has been a quick learner.

"You've just got to spoonfeed things to him, but with Keith it only takes a few seconds," Parcells said. "He has an understanding and, if he doesn't have an understanding, he clears it up right away."

"I've been studying and I'm going to continue to study and that's one of the reasons why I've played in this league so long," Byars said.

He has quickly given Drew Bledsoe another target to go with Ben Coates, Shawn Jefferson, Terry Glenn and others that keeps defenses from focusing on any one receiver.

While he hasn't wasted time learning his various jobs - special teams, second tight end, backup fullback - Byars isn't ready to render a final judgment on Johnson's performance.

"It's too early to say," Byars said. "You have to give him the benefit of the doubt. After the season's over, then you judge him."

Joe Torre breathes life into brother and Gotham with win

By Lisa M. Hamm
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Frank Torre sat in his hospital bed Tuesday watching the televised ticker-tape parade honoring his kid brother's team.

Perched on his head was a Yankees' World Series Champion baseball cap, and in his chest was a new 28-year-old heart. "It's almost frightening — it feels like a million bucks," said Torre, his voice still hoarse from yelling during the sixth and final game Saturday night, just one day after his long-awaited heart transplant.

At the opposite end of Manhattan from Columbia-Presbyterian Medical Center, Torre's brother Joe, the Yankees' manager, was receiving the adulation of millions of ecstatic fans and the key to the city from Mayor Rudolph Giuliani.

Frank Torre, a terrycloth robe over his hospital gown and a World Champions jacket hanging nearby sat with his wife, Anne, and chuckled as they read get-well wishes from the likes of former Los Angeles Dodgers manager Tommy Lasorda and Hall of Famers Willie Mays and Hank Aaron.

"You're in our thoughts and prayers," wrote Lasorda. "P.S. I hope you got an Italian heart."

"Not bad for two kids from Brooklyn," wrote Oakland Raiders owner Al Davis, who grew up in a Brooklyn neighborhood near the Torre family.

Frank Torre played from 1956 to 1960 with Milwaukee Braves teams that won two National League pennants and one World Series — in fact, they beat the Yankees in 1957. He retired in 1963 after two seasons with the Philadelphia Phillies.

After a 2 1/2 month wait, Torre, 64, received his new heart on Friday, the Yankees' off day before the 3-2 Series victory Saturday night over Atlanta. He acknowledged that his story is almost too incredible to be real.

"If you had taken the book or movie to some producer or director they'd have thrown you out," he said, laughing. "They would have said it was too much of a fantasy."

He and his wife expressed gratitude to the family of the Bronx man whose death renewed Torre's hope for life, and encouraged people to participate in the organ donor program.

Torre said he didn't regret missing the parade. "I think I've taken enough of my brother's thunder," he said.

"My brother ... has finally convinced the rest of the world of something I've already known — that he's not just a good manager, he's a great manager and he's never had a chance to manage a team that was competitive."

Torre fingered the championship cap, a gift from Joe Torre. "It's one of the few he could keep dry!" he exclaimed, referring to the postgame locker-room champagne deluge.

Dr. Mehmet C. Oz, the cardiologist who performed the transplant with Dr. Eric Rose, called Frank Torre's prognosis "super." "He was a very cool cookie," said Oz. "I never had a patient so calm before surgery. Because he's used to spending his life peaking for important events."

Torre probably will be discharged from the hospital next week, but will continue a regime of physical therapy, medication and regular check-ups, Oz said.

To stay nearby for follow-up care, Torre, a Florida resident, has rented an apartment near the doctor's home in Fort Lee, N.J., for six months. "I told him he'll have to teach my daughter baseball," Oz said with a smile.

three-pointer title.

Serronico and Gladstone also worked their way to their respective foul shooting titles, with Dennis Bellville capturing the undergrad men's free-throw championship.

• At the Boyden pool, the intramural swim meet was won by the Lazy Lifeguards and Delta Chi.

On the men's side, Jeff Lee won a pair of individual events, while George Nicala, Jesse Creeden and Andrew Cotler each won one.

For the women, Sarah Jones and Anna Brown each grabbed two wins and Carolyn McGonagle took one.

• First round playoffs for soccer and flag football are starting, with 73 teams on the flag football schedule. Playoffs for the two sports, as well as soccer, continue through Nov. 7 on the Boyden Fields.

• Schick three-on-three basketball entries are due in the intramural office by Nov. 4, with the players' meeting scheduled for Nov. 6 at 6 p.m. in Boyden 249. There is limited space for the Holiday Basketball Tournament, so it's first come, first served. Entries due by Nov. 4.

Lacrosse club heads inside for winter

With a challenging spring schedule on the slate, the UMass lacrosse club is heading indoors to beat the weather and stay conditioned. The team is now heading to Boyden Gym three nights a week for box lacrosse, a fast-paced version of the sport.

The official start for box lacrosse is Nov. 4, 9–11 p.m. However, Mike Nowlan, Trevor Spiers, Brendan Keenan, Russell Ramm, Tim Mooney and Paul Barron all got an early start to the season when they warmed the gym up last week.

Box lacrosse is not a formal league, as teams change every session and no formal stats are kept. Experienced new players are welcome to join the league, and can do so by contacting coach Judy Dietel at 545–3815.

Men's club volleyball ready to start season

The UMass men's volleyball club finished last year strong with a third place finish in New England and an undefeated record in the Western Division.

Now the team is ready to start this season. The UMass A team returns outside hitters Jason Greenlaw, Chris Blute, Michael "Harri" Harrington, Wayne Chestna, Pedro Fernandes and Rob Settembro; middle hitters Chris Lu and Jarrett "J.C." Laven; and setter Michael Shippee.

The team has also added new members Patrick Moreau and Eric Blahut (outside hitters) along with Damian Gasparatto (setter). In addition, they will be coached by grad student Russ Nelson, who has coached the sport for many years.

This year's election have been held, with Shippee and Settembro being elected co-presidents. Fernandes was named treasurer and Kha Le was elected secretary.

UMass is ranked as the preseason No. 1 in the New England region. It is favored to win the New England Club volleyball League, and could go on to the Nationals.

L.A. Lakers hope O'Neal is the real deal

By John Nadel
Associated Press

INGLEWOOD, Calif. — History reveals the Lakers have had a dominant center on each of their 11 NBA championship teams. Now, they've got another they hope will lead them to No. 12, and more. "I can't see a team that's much better than us, and that includes Chicago," said veteran guard Byron Scott, who played on three Laker championship teams in the 1980s.

"There's no question we have an overdog team," Lakers coach Del Harris said. "Obviously, there's a lot of excitement everywhere we go."

The excitement level increased dramatically in July when Shaquille O'Neal left the Orlando Magic for the Lakers, signing a seven-year, $120 million contract.

O'Neal, 24, averaged 27.2 points, 12.5 rebounds and 2.8 blocked shots in four years with the Magic. Poor foul shooting or not, those numbers qualify him as a dominant center.

"You've got so many options," point guard Nick Van Exel said. "Great scorer, rebounds, starts the (fast) break so well. "He's a great scorer, an intimidator in the middle, a great shot-blocker. I want to help him lead the league in scoring and I want him to help me lead the league in assists."

The Lakers are in search of their first championship since 1988 - the year before center Kareem Abdul-Jabbar, the leading scorer in NBA history, called it quits. Abdul-Jabbar played a key role on the five Laker championship teams of the 1980s.

George Mikan was the center on the five Minneapolis Lakers championship teams of the late 1940s and early 1950s, and Wilt Chamberlain was the man in the middle for the team that won the title in 1972.

O'Neal is one of several new Lakers. With Magic Johnson back in retirement, only five players return from last year's team, eliminated in the first round of the playoffs. The returnees are starters Van Exel, Cedric Ceballos, Eddie Jones and Elden Campbell, and reserve forward Corie Blount.

Among the newcomers is Kobe Bryant, who is going straight from high school to the NBA. Bryant, who turned 18 in August, was taken by Charlotte as the 13th overall selection in last June's NBA draft and acquired by the Lakers in exchange for center Vlade Divac. O'Neal has made it clear on several occasions he's happy to be out of Orlando, in the Los Angeles area and with the Lakers. "It's very exciting, I'm just looking forward to playing," he said. "It's different. It's a new start for me. It's like I'm coming out of college, I just got drafted.

"The expectations (with the Lakers) are high. They're always going to be high. My expectations are very, very high."

The Lakers' season opener is a sellout, as are seven other games on the schedule. In fact, the only tickets that remain on sale for any home games this season cost $21 - the least expensive in the 17,505-seat Forum.

Van Exel said the offense the Lakers will run is "exactly the same as last year." That means O'Neal won't be involved in every play and, as Van Exel pointed out, will get the opportunity to show everybody he's "not just a dunker."

"We're not going to be just a one-dimensional team," Harris said. "We're going to be that, a team. Shaq will not be the No. 1 option on every play. We have some very good options out there - Eddie, Cedric, Elden. Elden became a very proficient inside scorer for us last year."

The Lakers lost to the Houston Rockets 3-1 in a first-round playoff series last spring after going 53-29 during the regular season. It was a chaotic time.

After the opening game against the Rockets, Johnson asserted that he should be more involved in the offense.

At another point in the series, Van Exel clamored for Jones to get the ball more.

"I'm just glad it's over with. I'm moving on," Van Exel said recently when asked about the way the 1995-96 season ended. "I'm glad to be on a team like this, that has a chance of doing something special."

Harris also believes the Lakers are capable of doing something special.

"The better you are physically, the more predictable you can afford to be," he said. "We've got great players. We want to try and unify and identify as best as possible. You've got people out there in Chicago and Seattle and San Antonio and Houston who feel like they're pretty good, too.

"If you're a good team, you have to be a good team every night. And you have to come together. We think we have some really outstanding players around (Shaq). We think we have a very balanced team, one that's capable of going out on the court and winning every night. I'm looking forward to (the season)."

NBA announces 50 all-time greatest players

By Chris Sheridan
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Some were so good their nicknames alone bring back memories. Wilt. Dr. J. Cooz. Magic. Pistol Pete. Pearl. Hondo. Tiny.

Some were simply big, as in Big E and Big O.

Others needed no more mention than their first names: Michael. Charles. Larry. Hakeem. Shaquille. Scottie.

Then there were those who played before the NBA became a multibillion-dollar industry; George Mikan, Bob Pettit, Paul Arazin. Hal Greer. Bill Sharman.

Tremendous basketball players, all of them.

And on the 50th anniversary of the NBA, the league announced Tuesday they were among the 50 chosen as the greatest to play the game.

"We've had an extraordinary array of extraordinary athletes come through the doors of the NBA over the past 50 years," commissioner David Stern said. "Had some of them played before the type of global audience that we have now, the world would have an extraordinarily different opinion of them."

With that invocation, Stern kicked off the NBA's 50th anniversary celebration and announced the 50 players chosen by a panel of 50 former players and coaches, current and former general managers, team executives and media.

The list, chosen without regard for position, includes 11 current players and 16 others who retired in the 1980s or '90s. Six of the 50 spent time in the ABA, and two others were in the National Basketball League, which merged with the 5-year-old Basketball Association of America in 1949 and eventually was renamed the NBA.

As a group, the 50 players accumulated 107 NBA championships, 49 Most Valuable Player awards, 17 Rookie of the Year honors, 447 All-Star selections and 36 scoring titles.

Vote totals were not released, and the 50 players were announced alphabetically rather than being ranked.

As for who was the best of all, five players who can make a stake to that claim - Oscar Robertson, Bill Russell, Wilt

Chamberlain, George Mikan and Julius Erving - were on hand for the announcement and diplomatically ducked that particular question. "I don't think there is one," Russell opined. "Nobody could ever play better than Oscar. Period. There are guys who could tie Oscar, but not beat him. Same thing with Bird, Magic, Jordan, Mikan, (Bob) Pettit. To say who was the best player is impossible."

Chamberlain, who scored 100 points in a March 2, 1962 game and averaged 50.4 points and 25.7 rebounds that season, has heard the topic discussed countless times.

"Personally, I'm a bit tired of the question. It's up to the fans to decide who in their opinion is the best player," Chamberlain said.

Perhaps the most surprising choice was Shaquille O'Neal, who has been in the league only four years and whose teams have been swept from the playoffs the past three seasons.

Also an iffy choice was Bill Walton, who played more than 60 games only three times during a 14-year, injury-riddled career. Notable by their absence were David Thompson, Alex English, Dominique Wilkins, Bob Lanier, Connie Hawkins, Bob McAdoo and Joe Fulks.

Other active players on the list were Charles Barkley, Clyde Drexler, Patrick Ewing, Michael Jordan, Karl Malone, Hakeem Olajuwon, Robert Parish, Scottie Pippen, David Robinson and John Stockton.

Globe's Shaughnessy: a look into big time reporting

Steven Grant

It is the end of the day, and Dan Shaughnessy is tired. There was the press conference, the radio appearance, the ballgame and, of course, the office, with all the phone calls, the messages and the faxes.

Sound like your average celebrity's daily routine? Well, maybe, though Shaughnessy is not a celebrity. However, as a sports columnist for the Boston Globe, he does find himself in their company quite frequently.

Despite all his other "odd jobs," Shaughnessy, 43, considers himself a sportswriter, first and foremost. It's something he's been doing since high school, and right now he's where he's wanted to be all along — at the top of his field, writing about whatever and whomever he chooses in the world of sports.

And he's aware that his position is an enviable one. Thousands of writers nationwide are typing away at local papers, waiting for the (non-existent?) day when they advance to their region's version of the Globe.

In the beginning ...

For Shaughnessy, that day eventually arrived. "At 19, I knew what I wanted to do," he said. "When I was in high school, I wrote for a weekly in my hometown of Groton. There I covered the various high school teams. Then I went on to Holy Cross as an English major. I was the sports editor there for three years.

"And it's a good thing I went to a small school, because the Globe has correspondents for football at those types of schools, unlike the larger ones in Boston. Two years out of college, I would write about 10 paragraphs on the neighborhood basketball stories no body cared about, before I got my first break in 1977."

People care about what Dan Shaughnessy writes today, particularly in Boston, where there is a fine line between sports fans and fanatics. He's won countless sportswriting awards and, in a sense, he is a celebrity. So why all the books, the "odd jobs," then? And why would Dan Shaughnessy, while experiencing his dream job, travelling the country (sometimes on a moment's notice) and sincerely enjoying himself, discourage others from seeking his profession?

"I definitely won't advise my kids to get into it," he said. "It's a tough road. I'm lucky I'm good at writing fast. Knowing early [that you want to be a sportswriter] helps a lot and having a degree means very little in this field. Writing about the stuff you don't like weeds people out early in their careers. Every [aspiring sportswriter] should have a plan B, without question."

Reality check

What's more, Plan A, even it's a dream job, doesn't always mean a dream paycheck, and Shaughnessy would be the first to attest to that.

"Hey, the Globe takes good care of me," he said. "But with this job it's not like you're Bryant Gumbel, where the money is just sitting at your doorstep. I've got kids to send to college, the house and what not. And that's why I do things like the TV appearances and the books and everything. I'm a freelance contractor."

And he's a freelance contractor for two reasons — he wants to, and he is able to. Shaughnessy's opinions on the Patriots' new kicker, the Celtics' playoff hopes or the future of baseball are strongly respected by local sports radio and TV show hosts, his colleagues and fans everywhere. Besides, he may be working second and third jobs, but he is hardly juggling Wendy's and scrubbing toilets.

Even better, in the past five years, Shaughnessy's reputation as an author is nearing his journalistic status. The Curse of the Bambino, the story of what has happened to the Red Sox since they sold away Babe Ruth, is his most popular book to date. Other works include One Strike Away, Seeing Red and his latest, At Fenway.

A main reason for Shaughnessy's popularity, even among non-sports fans, is his ability to relate to his reader through comparisons of current issues, usually existing outside the sportsworld.

Like when he recently said the Red Sox, who were playing inconsistent ball toward the end of this past season, were "coming back from the dead more than Vincent Price and Tom Cruise."

"I try to know everything I can about current events," he says. "I read the front page, the Living/Arts section. You know, if a French Canadian gets into an accident on 93, then you throw in a joke about Canadian drivers somewhere."

Is every column a gem? No, says Shaughnessy.

"There's days when you're not happy with your work, just like with any other job," he said. "And sometimes when you're on deadline, you don't have time to check over your work. You just send it in and hope for the best. But I write pretty fast. I can write a good column in about an hour and a half. But I can also come up with complete horseshit if I've got 10 hours."

From Baltimore to Amherst

From 1977 to 1981, Shaughnessy wrote for The Baltimore Sun, covering Earl Weaver and the Baltimore Orioles. Then he took a job with the Baltimore Star, which folded within a year, thanks to the Washington Post, according to Shaughnessy. In 1982, he returned full time to the Globe, reporting on the region he grew up in, an obvious benefit. First, he covered the Celtics ("when they were good") until 1986. From then until 1989, he covered the Red Sox, before settling into his latest position.

One of the topics Shaughnessy has dealt with on occasion is the UMass basketball team, on which he gives his two cents on what's happening on and off the court. A couple of months ago, he wrote a scathing article on ex-coach John Calipari for leaving campus for an NBA gig with a fat contract. Now he comments on the Marcus Camby situation, where the former standout center admitted to accepting gifts from agents during the course of the season, violating NCAA rules.

"I'm afraid for them," he said of those within the basketball program, which is facing possible sanctions within the near future. "You've got a case where the kid admitted to taking the stuff. I see no way around that. I guess they're still waiting on the ruling, but I really think it could get pretty harsh.

"But [giving] coach James 'Bruiser' Flint the job seems like a good idea. They've got the guards coming back, but Carmelo [Travieso] really needed those other scoring threats. He's great from outside but he can't create much from what I've seen. It should be pretty interesting. I guess we'll have to wait and see."

He lists among his most memorable events the 1986 World Series, the 1984 NBA Finals and the 1991 World Series.

But Dan Shaughnessy is tired, he needs to go to sleep. Little does he know, a Chicago Bear just broke a record. So he'll be on a plane tomorrow, headed for the Windy City.

after the unyielding butt-whupping, BU fell to Providence in the Hockey East semifinals, was lackluster in its NCAA match-up against Clarkson, and was simply destroyed by Michigan, the first time BU has been shut out by a team other than Maine since February of 1984.

UMass, meanwhile is still focused and more determined than ever to tear apart the Terriers tomorrow night, in their lone game this year at Walter Brown Arena. Wins in either Saturday night's game at the William D. Mullins Center, or their game here in Amherst on Feb. 7 will be nice, but will pale in comparison to winning on NESN tomorrow night in the eyes of the Minutemen.

If there's one singular thing that UMass can do to earn the measure of league and nationwide respect that it is looking to obtain this year, short of reaching the Hockey East semis at the FleetCenter, it would be to take at least one of its meetings with BU.

Much like downing then-No. 1 Maine two years ago, it is a tangible victory and sign of success. A win would be a trophy for coach Joe Mallen and his team to hold aloft in promoting the program, especially with luring recruits.

Beating this year's BU team is no different than any other — the Terriers never have a down year. BU lost four of its top six scorers from last year and barely missed a step, pulling in a strong recruiting class, including Tom Poti, one of the most highly sought-after blue chips in the country last year.

BU always has been and, so long as Parker stays, always will be. It is a program to be respected and feared on the ice, and one all too familiar to the numerous Minutemen who grew up in the Boston area, routinely watching the scarlet and white skate the Beanpot around the hallowed Garden on the second Monday of February seemingly every year.

BU is eastern college hockey's Muhammad Ali. To the region, it's Vince Lombardi's Packers, Joe Blake's Canadiens or, as much as it pains me to say it, Mickey Mantle's Yankees. BU is eastern college hockey's Titanic. Its Spanish Armada. Its Goliath. BU is meant to be indestructible.

But, as all of the above have in common, they sunk — some like the Titanic have yet to be salvaged. Nothing UMass can do this weekend could ever do quite that much damage to the BU program, but a win at some point this year would vault UMass into a new light, at the expense of a school that this team loves to hate.

As for the Boy Scouts who claim, "That's too much football and not enough school," relax. They're on winter break anyway, and if they weren't playing, they'd be lifting weights three hours a day preparing for next year. So set it up, corporate America, and make me and my readers happy.

Booty Schwag of the Week Award...

Whew, I am tired. That was quite a rant, huh? Well, thanks for sticking around, because here it is, the pinnacle of sports journalism in America today, the Booty Schwag! I had a tough time this week trying to find a schwag-errific performance worthy of mention.

This week the schwag goes to Kansas, who lost to Nebraska 63-7 on Saturday. What? I thought Kansas was good now? Don't worry, Jayhawks, you'll kill the Huskers in hoop, but for now, put a bag over your head and run back to Lawrence in shame. A pre-season Top 25 squad, Kansas is now 3-4, with losses to Utah and Texas Tech on their record. Hey, Glen Mason, maybe you should have left when you had the chance.

Tonight's Game...

With the World Series over, Thursday night football returns with Boston College at Pitt. Oh, boy. This is ridiculous. Somebody has got to call ESPN and fix this. Maybe they can show a "Bodyshaping" marathon or something. There has not been a good game on Thursday yet, and it's starting to bug me. I don't even think the kids in Chestnut Hill care about this one.

ARIES
March 21–April 20
Someone with a sharp tongue may have you feeling hounded. Accept their criticism with good grace if you possibly can, and make an effort to let it roll off you. After all, they may only want to help you.

TAURUS
April 21–May 21
Bargains galore await if you're in a shopping mood. Pay close attention for diamonds in the rough—you could be in a position to pull off a real steal. Hold your tongue if someone confides in you.

GEMINI
May 22–June 21
This is a good week to make a fresh start, particularly if you want to improve your health. A change in diet revitalizes you. Take a look at your financial picture to see if you can reduce a crippling debt.

CANCER
June 22–July 22
A coworker's help and advice help launch you on the path to achieving an important goal. Pay close attention to the small talk at a social gathering. You could make an important contact.

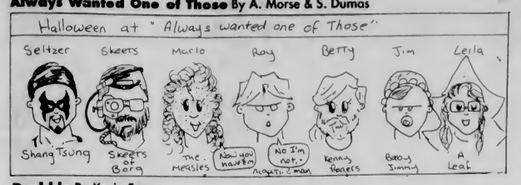
LEO
July 23–August 23
Make back-up plans for an outing you're particularly keen on. The weather may not cooperate—but if you have a plan B, you need not lose out on some needed R&R. Contemplate picking up some extra tasks at work during the busy season.

VIRGO
August 24–September 22
Concentrate on clarifying as many of your long-term goals as possible this weekend. It's vital that you break larger goals down into manageable bits, too. Otherwise, you could end up feeling overwhelmed, or worse, like a failure.

LIBRA
September 23–October 23
Repair this week—don't buy. You'll save money and maybe even be able to buy something you've been wanting for a long time. Invest in long-term prosperity, rather than instant gratification.

SCORPIO
October 24–November 22
Keep personal and business spheres far apart this week. Luck in one arena could raise obstacles in the other, and that's something you cannot afford. Extra effort you once made to please someone pays off.

SAGITTARIUS
November 23–December 21
Focus on finishing up one difficult job, rather than dividing your attention among several. You'll be more efficient in the long run. Discuss a major purchase with an expert to save money.



CAPRICORN
December 22–January 20
A dramatic gesture gains you a lot of attention. Think ahead to be sure it's the kind of attention you really want. Generally, your judgment is good, but this week could be an exception. Resist the temptation to indulge in something frivolous.

AQUARIUS
January 21–February 18
This is an excellent week to build a nest egg. If you're handling someone else's money, counsel them to save as well. You'll instill a real habit of responsibility, especially in a younger person.

PISCES
February 19–March 20
Gather all the information available before you make an important decision or purchase. What seems like a bargain could be a real lemon. A romantic evening leads to renewed affection and sympathy. It could even inspire you into making a commitment.

My dad didn't want anybody to notice his birthday... as if he was ashamed.

I know when I was young it meant presents or cake maybe, or a party.

When I wos a teenoger I was proud of myself. I mode it through school another yeor, I was getting bigger, my friends said, "You look great!"

My dad says he's happy to be still olive ond not dead from terminol poison ivy or o rotten attitude.

He says os you get older you start holding back ond scheming on how to live as long as you can.

Then you get real old and you're out there trying to enjoy every single morning because it might be your last sunrise... looking at flowers and listening to birds... like o little kid.

I was born on March 3rd and 4th. I guess thot's why I'm a little ashamed of myself. I can't keep the first doy straight. Once I settle my birth dote,.....

I'll try to tackle my growing shoplifting problem.

Minutewomen drop Big Green 2–1; two games remain for UM

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

While the schedule says that the focus can be directed totally on the remaining regular season conference game and the Atlantic 10 Tournament, that is not actually the case.

After a 2–1 win over Dartmouth in Hanover, N.H., the Massachusetts field hockey team now has two games remaining on its slate.

Massachusetts	2
Dartmouth	1

On Saturday, the team will face A-10 foe St. Joseph's, and Monday the Minutewomen will conclude the season when they host Yale in a make-up game. The originally scheduled tilt against Yale was rained out on Sept. 18.

Against Dartmouth, the No. 8 Minutewomen (12–5, 4–0 in the Atlantic 10) were led by Courtney MacLean, who had a two-goal outing on the afternoon.

The Big Green (8–8) got on the board first just over 15 minutes into the game, when Weze Shorts connected on the rebound of Jen Karlen's shot in front of the UMass cage.

The Minutewomen tied up the contest only seven minutes later. Saskia Fuchs got the ball to MacLean inside the circle, where MacLean redirected it for the tally.

The score was tied going into halftime, and remained so until MacLean notched the game winner 8:23 into the second period. MacLean one-timed a pass from Erica Johnston on a penalty corner situation.

UMass goalie Hilary Rose made 12 saves on the afternoon to solidify the Minutewoman defense. Big Green goalie Kendra Kosko stopped nine shots in the Dartmouth net.

Massachusetts ended the afternoon 1-for-13 on penalty corner, while Dartmouth was 0-for-9. This was a turnaround from UMass' last game, when the team was awarded only two corner situations.

Yesterday's game afforded UMass coach Pam Hixon the opportunity to start some members of her team who have previously only seen substitution minutes. Nicole Bardell, Rachel Meeks and Kathryn Cameron all started for the Minutewomen, while Christine Millbauer and Jana Benscoter saw time off the bench.

Now the Minutewomen will concentrate on St. Joseph's, which will visit Amherst on Saturday at 2 p.m.

Saturday's game will be the deciding factor in the race for the A-10 regular season title. UMass currently stands first in the conference, having posted a perfect 4–0 conference record. La Salle sits second in the standings, after posting a 3–1 mark in the A-10.

A win would seal the regular season title for UMass, while a loss would mean UMass and La Salle would hold the title together.

Monday afternoon also marks senior day for three UMass athletes who will be playing in their final game on Totman Field.

Kyle Rothenberger, a midfielder and All-America candidate. Melanie Gore, a back who leads the UMass defense, and Hilary Rose, an All-American candidate goaltender, will play in their final game in the maroon and white.

Minutewomen Notes: MacLean's two goals give her a season total of nine, which surpasses her career total by five goals... Johnston's assist is her third on the year, and gives her a season point total of 23, which ranks her second in the team standings.a

Michigan: Ohio's only true test

I'm not talking about last weekend's college football games. I mean it. It was an all-out schwagfest. No games were played that will mean a thing three weeks from now, and my North Texas Eagles were spanked at home. I'll hold my breath if I have to...

Well, alright, but I am not happy about it.

So what did we have Saturday? West Virginia lost, but I told you they would. BC was put in its place — hard — by Syracuse. Ohio State passed a big test on the road by pummeling Iowa, and Rutgers beat Temple in a possible Dookie Bowl preview. Not much to go on, and this week is not going to be much better.

Let's bypass this week's lame schedule and talk about what is shaping up to be the national championship situation. Ohio State ran their record to 7–0 with an impressive win over the Hawkeyes, and have created a little problem for the Alliance.

According to my calculations, they're not going to lose again. They have Minnesota, Illinois, Indiana and Michigan left, and if they fall to one of these teams, you can throw me out in front of Antonio's around 1:30 on a Thursday night with nothing but a kilt, a pair of flippers and a bottle of Jaegermeister and tell me to sing "Oh, Canada" in Spanish. It is not going to happen.

The Buckeyes are on a roll, and shouldn't break a sweat until Michigan comes to the Horseshoe. If you remember history, you'll remember that it was just one year ago that former Wolverine Tim Biakabatukka broke off a nasty day, and the Michigan ruined OSU's dream run at the Rose Bowl and a national championship. John Cooper knows that this dream season, which has been entirely unexpected, will not count in the eyes of the Red and Grey faithful unless they beat Michigan. I think they step up and do it.

So what's the problem? Florida isn't going to lose either. They have Georgia, Vanderbilt (I'd like to see the spread on that one) and South Carolina before the big one, Florida State, on the road the Saturday after Thanksgiving. The Gators have beaten LSU and Auburn, both Top 20 conference teams, by a combined score of 106–23 the last two weekends. Ouch, baby, ouch. They're not going to beat Florida State 106–23, but if they're on their game it might be close. Having to go up to Knoxville and play Tennessee, who despite being overrated, was No. 2 in the country and had 107,000 fans looking for blood, prepared them for Tallahassee's toma-hawking legions. They survived that challenge with flying colors. They'll be ready for Florida State.

Which leaves us with a doozy of a dilemma. If bowl season comes with the Buckeyes and the Gators undefeated, decisions must be made. Ohio State, as Big Ten Champion, is committed to the Rose Bowl, and as such will play Arizona State on January 1. Florida, on the other hand, is free to pursue any bowl it wants. Now, if I was Steve Spurrier, I'd pick the Independence Bowl (Shreveport in December is fab-u-lous). But since Steve probably wants to win the national championship, he'll take his troops to New Orleans for the Sugar Bowl, where they'll most likely face Nebraska.

Alright, it's January 2. You open up the paper, and who do you see on top?

Florida.

Is this fair? No, of course not. But since Arizona State is overrated and the pollsters know this, they'll go with the Gators, provided they beat Nebraska (which they will). The same thing happened in 1994, when Penn St. and Nebraska went undefeated and the Huskers won it all.

This really annoys me, because the polls refuse to give the Big Ten credit, and when they see Florida beat teams 56–13 and 90–3, they talk about big numbers." Well, Ohio State wins big too, and week in and week out they play tougher teams because the Big Ten is top to bottom better than the SEC. Should there be a two-team playoff?

Yes! Though the Alliance (sounds like Death Star to me) means well, and will set this up next season, we're in rough shape now. You could call it the Anti-Dookie Bowl, and you could have it two weeks after New Year's day. You'd have no problem getting sponsors, and the two schools would rake in the dough, which, despite the most well-intentioned denials from Div. 1 athletic directors, is what

UM hockey to face a dog of a challenge; Terriers terrorize HE

For an eastern college hockey team, one concerned with its growth as a program in particular, the ultimate measuring stick is Boston University. The fastest means of gaining respectability is defeating BU, as the road to both the Hockey East title and the NCAAs invariably runs down Babcock Street and right through Walter Brown Arena.

The Terriers routinely devour lesser teams like a slice at T' Anthony's, and even good teams generally leave the noisy, cramped arena battered with another notch in their loss column.

Two years ago, the fledgling Minutemen went down more like a slice of extra cheese than anything else, losing badly three times.

Last year, though, UMass showed flashes of brilliance on the frozen pond once patrolled by the likes of Mike Eruzione, up through Tony Amonte, Keth Tkachuk and Shawn McEachern.

The 1995–96 Terriers advanced to the Final Four before a superior Michigan Wolverine team ripped them to shreds. This was a quality team that was ranked No. 1 for much of the season, and featured a pair of underclassmen who are currently leading regular shifts in the NHL (Mike Grier, Edmonton and Chris O'Sullivan, Calgary).

In the opening game of their Hockey East quarterfinal series in Beantown, the Minutemen skated stride-for-stride with coach Jack Parker's specterous team, never backing down. UMass tallied a pair of power play goals against a stingy defense, and by game's end was in a situation where they were pulling their goaltender in the game's waning moments on BU's home ice.

The following night BU ran the score through the building's shallow roof to levels seldom seen outside of pee- wee house leagues. It felt more like watching my nine-year old cousin play a game at Framingham's Loring Arena at 8:00 a.m. than a Division I college game.

BU's intention was clearly to just destroy any momentum and confidence that the young up-and-coming team had built, and reinstate an apparently missing fear of the mighty scarlet jerseys with "Boston" across the front.

The end result proved more disastrous for the Terriers than the Minutemen. Perhaps feeling overconfident in their own abilities

UMass needs to be lone star at Texas A&M tourney

By Leigh Torbin
Collegian Staff

There's no pressure on the No. 20 Massachusetts women's soccer team (13–2–1, 7–0–1 in the A-10) as it travels to College Station, Texas for this weekend's Post Oak Mall Soccer Classic. Their entire season's only at stake.

Riding the proverbial NCAA Tournament bubble, the Minutewomen will square off against No. 14 George Mason tomorrow at 2:30 eastern time, and play either host No. 7 Texas A&M or No. 9 UNC-Greensboro on Sunday based on tomorrow's winners and losers.

Winning the Atlantic 10 Championship next weekend would carry only slightly more meaning than can be found in a Warrant song in the eyes of the NCAA. The Minutewomen will need a strong showing on the road against some legitimate non-conference powers to secure a berth.

The Minutewomen should have some confidence heading into the George Mason match, having quelled the Patriots 1–0 last year in a tournament at William & Mary. The Minutewomen will have to be prepared for this side, though, after facing three straight A-10 teams.

UMass came out slow against a strong Dartmouth side, giving up a pair of early goals in a 2–0 loss that was even otherwise. UMass cannot let the quicker speed of tomorrow's match catch it off guard in the opening moments as it did against the Big Green.

Coach Jack Cicala's side boasts a 11–4–2 mark this year, all four losses coming at the hands of top 20 teams. The Patriots are unbeaten in their last eight matches dating back to a 2–1 loss to Penn State on Oct. 4. The only comparison to be drawn to UMass from GMU's results is an even one — each team played to a 2–2 tie at George Washington.

Junior Jen Gross does the bulk of the Patriot scoring, leading the team with 16 goals and 35 points, more than twice as many as second-leading scorer Shannon Timberlake. Jaime Pagiarulo boasts a 1.05 goals against average in the Patriot net.

George Mason is hardly a walk in the park, but should prove to be easier than either of Sunday's potential opponents.

The Aggies (16–2) and Spartans (15–3) will prove a major stumbling block on UMass' road to an NCAA berth, in a game that will not go unnoticed either through reports, or especially in person, as the Aggies are ninth in the nation in home attendance, and have welcomed almost 15,000 fans this year combining home, road and neutral site matches.

UMass nipped the Aggies 2–1 at Richard F. Garber Field last year and will likely be hunted for revenge if they should face their hosts on Sunday at the Aggie Soccer Complex, where they are 7–0 this year.

Texas A&M is a speedy team that will have the benefit of being well rested, having not played since a 4–0 drubbing of hated and despised rival Texas on Oct. 22.

Blazing Bryn Blalack is a sight to behold up front for the Aggies. The sixth-leading scorer in the nation has scored 21 times in 18 matches, seven times recording the game-winner.

Texas A&M hardly has a one-dimensional offense that lacks behind Blalack, with Kristen Koop posting 37 points, Diana Rowe accumulating 28 and Yvette Okler registering 27 points on a team that has outscored it opponents 71–13 this year.

Only twice has this juggernaut been held scoreless, in its two losses of the year, against then-No. 10 Nebraska and No. 2 North Carolina.

Meanwhile, Melanie Wilson is no slouch in the net, posting a 0.62 GAA, placing her 10th in the nation, not far behind Minutewoman Danielle Dion, who's eighth with a 0.58 mark.

UMass' other option for Sunday, UNC-Greensboro, will not roll over either. UMass is less familiar with the Spartans, never having faced them and lacking a common opponent for this year. UNC-Greensboro did beat George Mason 4–1 earlier this year, though.

Each of the Spartans' trio of losses came to nationally-ranked opposition, falling to then No. 16 Kentucky 2–1 in their season-opener, then No. 4 Portland 3–0 and then No. 8 Florida 4–1.

With 22 goals and 57 points, Ali Lord is the fifth leading scorer in the nation and suffice it to say an important portion of the Spartan offense. Lord is the leading scorer in the Southeast Region, even ahead of anyone from another branch of the UNC system that has a decent women's soccer tradition.

Fin Kati Kantanen is second on the team with 33 points, while Kelly Merriss has 17.

Paula Domitrovits has logged the majority of the time in the UNC-Greensboro net and posted a 1.31 GAA with just 3.5 shutouts.

Regardless of which teams UMass faces on Sunday in the Texas prairie, the team will have a tough challenge at hand, which it must tackle to ensure an NCAA bid.

The Massachusetts men's crew is sponsoring its sixth annual "Rent-A-Rower" to benefit the club.

For $70, you can rent a UMass rower to do odd jobs around the house like rake leaves, paint, clean and anything else within reason.

The annual event raises money for the program to supplement their budget. The team uses the money to purchase practice equipment, and to fund various trips to races.

The event runs this weekend and next weekend.

Sailing successful, despite rough weather

On Oct. 19, the Massachusetts sailing club raced in the largest national regatta, the Smith Trophy, at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Sailing in MIT dingies and against the inclement weather, Will McLaughlin and Lara Robby placed fifth in their race, which was Robby's first time sailing.

Emily Drowne and Jeff Earl weren't as lucky in their race, as their boat was capsized by the hurricane winds, forcing them to swim ashore.

Rob Meharg, John Wysocki, Craig Thrall and Maurice Dressler sailed at the Northern Series at the University of New Hampshire on Oct. 26. Results from that race are not currently available.

Anyone interested in joining the UMass sailing club can stop by the club office at 423C Student Union or call Jesse at 549–8138. People of all experience levels are welcome.

Brazilian plane crash kills 96 passengers

SAO PAULO, Brazil (AP) — The passenger jet was in the air for less than five minutes yesterday before it clipped an apartment building and skidded through the Vila Santa Catarina neighborhood, spilling fuel and igniting cars and homes.
All 90 passengers and six crew members aboard TAM Regional Airlines Flight 402 were killed. At least three Americans were among the dead.
Two bodies were pulled from rubble on the ground, and the death toll was expected to rise as firefighters, civil defense workers, police and volunteers searched the debris amid charred house frames.
Part of the fuselage stuck out of a garage roof. The narrow, winding streets of red-tile-roofed houses were littered with pieces of twisted metal and melted plastic.
The Fokker-100 jetliner took off from Sao Paulo's Congonhas airport at 8:30 a.m. (6:30 a.m. EST) and was en route to Rio de Janeiro when it crashed only a mile from the runway, said civil defense Sgt. Carlos Santana. The weather was sunny and clear.
Gerson de Paula, a 27-year-old hairdresser, said the plane clipped an apartment building, hit the ground and skidded along the street, spilling fuel and igniting cars and homes.

Gore hits the Hub to support Kerry

BOSTON (AP) — With polls showing Massachusetts all but won for President Clinton and New Hampshire still within reach, Vice President Al Gore was coming to Boston today to speak on behalf of Sen. John Kerry as part of a New England campaign swing.
Gore was slated to arrive in Boston about noon and then make a 12:30 p.m. open-air speech at Faneuil Hall. He was to depart about 4 p.m. for Manchester, N.H., where he was to make another appearance on behalf of local candidates and the Clinton/Gore presidential ticket.
Kerry is running in a dead heat in his re-election battle with Gov. William F. Weld. Gore is a late addition to Kerry's roster of political supporters, and the president himself is slated to visit Springfield on Sunday to reiterate his support for Kerry.
Springfield officials said yesterday that Clinton will speak 9 p.m. Sunday at Court Square downtown. Kerry and other Democrats also were to attend the rally.
Like Gore, the president will then travel to New Hampshire to make one final appeal for votes.
A poll taken late last week showed Clinton leading Republican nominee Bob Dole 58 percent to 26 percent in Massachusetts. Dole has not visited the state since winning the nomination in August, concentrating instead on states where his poll numbers are more favorable.

Kerry: "Republicans trick, Democrats treat"

Senator John Kerry shows off a t-shirt given to him by Chancellor Scott at yesterday's forum held in the Cape Cod Lounge.

Kennedy, Kerry & Olver discuss student concerns about education

Jonathan Liberty
Collegian Staff

With the Nov. 5 election fast approaching, over 350 people crowded the Cape Cod Lounge of the Student Union to hear Senators John F. Kerry (D), Edward M. Kennedy (D), Congressman John Olver (D–Amherst) and U.S. Department of Education (DoE) Secretary Richard Riley speak about the role of higher education while addressing student concerns.

After a 45–minute delay, University of Massachusetts Chancellor David K. Scott welcomed the panel.

"In the next 10 years, there will be few things more important than education," Scott said. "It is my honor and pleasure to welcome to campus Sen. Kerry, Sen. Kennedy, Congressman Olver and Secretary of Education Riley, who have all been on the forefront of education for a long time."

Scott then introduced Student Government Association (SGA) member Latoya Simms, who introduced the panel.

"Since the first week of the semester the UMass Votes Campaign has registered over 8,000 students and has proven that apathy amongst college students is a myth," Simms said. Simms explained that over 50 percent of the voters registered as "independent."

"The registered voters may not identify with a particular party, but we do identify with the issues," she said.

Sen. Kerry began speaking to an enthusiastic round of applause.

"We want to adopt the motto Refuse to Lose and add the Will to Win in order to make this a very special Tuesday," Kerry said.

Kerry added, "This election is not about me, or Clinton or Weld — it is about the future."

Only questions about education were allowed during the discussion.

Josh Jacobson asked the first question to all members of the panel, "Are you going to come to UMass just in election years, or are you going to come year in and year out?"

"I have been out here every year since I have been a senator," Kerry said.

Kerry said that he has helped get money for the Polymer Science Center building, assisted in the Western Massachusetts Technology Transfer and he has also been involved in environmental forums on campus.

"It is well worth reminding us of the importance of coming here," Kennedy said.

Olver, who lives in Amherst and is a former UMass professor told the audience that he keeps very close ties to the University and will continue to do so.

Stacey Shackford, whose face was painted blue for Halloween, asked the panel their opinions of Massachusetts

Students greet Democrat politicians with approval

Students at the University of Massachusetts, while enduring a 45–minute wait in a steamy room packed with potential voters, thought the hour–long forum featuring Senators John F. Kerry and Edward M. Kennedy was well worth the wait.

The complete panel included the U.S. Department of Education (DoE) Secretary Richard Riley and Congressman John Olver (D–Amherst), while State Senator Stan Rosenburg (D–Amherst) and Ellen Story (D–Amherst) were also present among the audience.

Jay Bragg, president of College Democrats at UMass, said that the panel's presence accomplished what the forum had set out to do.

"I think today was excellent for the very reason that UMass was able to see the exact difference between John Kerry and Bill Weld," Bragg said. "Kerry made an important point to include students because he cares about students."

Bragg pointed out that Kerry made an exceptional effort to involve students, including those who had packed around the windows outside of the Cape Cod lounge because they were unable to squeeze into the cramped room.

"You don't see Gov. Weld here interacting with students," said Bragg.

Lyndsey Wagner, a junior English and French major, said that she was particularly impressed with the question and answer format of this forum.

"I like the fact that they allowed students to ask questions," Wagner said.

When the meeting was opened for questions, Kerry jumped off the platform and moved into the audience with a microphone in hand.

"I think it's great," said Nawrocki, a senior wood technology major. "They have a huge voting crowd here and I'm surprised they haven't come here before."

"I think it's good they're here," said Mike Flynn, a senior exercise science major. "It's about time they've had something like this on campus."

Kerry had addressed a question similar to these observations saying that since he's been in office, he has come to UMass every year.

According to Kerry, he was present here to help raise money for the Sylvio O. Conte Building. He said he was also a part of the Western Mass. Technical Transfer and of an environmental forum.

"Students tend not to notice us in non–election years," said Kerry.

Elizabeth Tuff, a junior economics major, said that she was impressed that these candidates would take the time out to talk with UMass students.

"It's good that they came to speak with students," said Tuff. "This offers good access to the candidates."

"I think it's great that they are getting young voters and educating them," agreed Shukaill, a freshman pre– psychology major. "What we vote will get them into office."

Dan Backer, treasurer of Student Advocates of Financial Aid (SAFA) which helped organize this event, said that as strong Republican he was "impressed by what the panel had to say."

"The panel definitely displayed a definite dedication to education," Backer said.

The only discouragement Backer voiced was that of time restraints.

"It was absolutely wonderful," he said. "I just wished we had more time so the panel could answer more questions."

GEO decries death of higher education

By Jonathan Liberty
Collegian Staff

To highlight the concerns of the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO), about 30 of their members held a mock funeral march in memory of accessible Public Higher Education yesterday.

The GEO members dressed in black carried a coffin and headstones from the Student Union building to Whitmore and back.

"At the end of every semester we say goodbye to more and more graduate employees," said GEO President Patrick Crowley.

GEO was marching in the name of access which they said includes child care and affirmative action.

The march supported the current affirmative action and family care demands of the GEO contract negotiations. Some of the affirmative action demands include increased funding to the Office of Graduate Student Minority Recruitment for Minority Teaching Fellowships from $48,000 to at least $1 million; creating a separate fund of $1 million for economically disadvantaged families, first generation college graduates, single parents and International students in need.

"The administration needs to follow their mission to support poor and working people," Crowley said.

A high priority GEO child care demand is 16 hour fully subsidized Flexible Child Care Center in a suitable centrally located space.

"Families who can't afford child care have to chose between graduate school employment and their family; this is a choice which they should not have to make," Crowley said.

The funeral ended with a eulogy from a GEO member.

She said, "Public higher education was a noble institution, dedicated to the mission of serving the poor and working people of the Commonwealth, the country and the world. Sadly, though, with the painful death of access, the mission is no longer with us."

GEO held a wreath with the words of Caesar Chavez, "Don't Mourn, organize."

Increased Tutsi warfare in Goma threatens food supply of refugees

GOMA, Zaire (AP) — Warfare and looting choked off relief supplies for 700,000 refugees Thursday, sending tens of thousands streaming south in a desperate search for food and safety.

Ethnic Tutsi rebels closed in on the Zairian-held city of Goma, and aid agencies said looting by Zairian troops had forced them to halt food distribution in the area, which now includes the world's largest refugee camp. The agencies also said they would evacuate foreign workers.

Cars packed with people and their salvaged household goods sped south. Streams of others trudged on foot, carrying reed mats and sacks on their heads and babies on their backs.

The fighting threatens to escalate the refugee crisis into a disaster as bad as the one Goma experienced in 1994, when 1.1 million Rwandan Hutus fled into Zaire. Tens of thousands died then for lack of food, water and medicine.

Artillery battles raged all morning around Goma's airport — the only route for food supplies to the 700,000 Rwandan Hutu refugees living in sprawling camps near the shores of Lake Kivu.

Even that lifeline was cut Thursday; the airport remained in Zairian hands but was closed by fighting. Roads from Rwanda, Burundi and Uganda into Zaire were already shut.

The Tutsis are fighting to repel Zairian army attacks and to push the Rwandan Hutu refugees further into Zaire. After capturing the provincial capital of Bukavu on Wednesday, they closed in on Goma, 60 miles to the north.

After a late meeting, Zaire's parliament urged Hutus from Rwanda to join Zaire's army in fighting the Tutsi rebels. It also urged Zaire's government to identify and expel all Rwandan Tutsis.

Shells fired from the hills across the border in Rwanda bludgeoned areas north of Goma on Thursday. From dawn into night, thudding booms and crackling gunfire sent thousands scurrying for safety.

Reports of a two-pronged Tutsi attack on Zairian positions north of Goma sent more than 110,000 Rwandan refugees from the Kahindo refugee camp and 20,000 local residents fleeing along dirt paths towards Goma's Mugunga camp.

Mugunga — swollen and miserable with some 400,000 inhabitants — is already the largest refugee camp in the world.

"This concentration is a recipe for rapid deterioration," said Ruth Marshall, spokeswoman for the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees in Geneva. "It could within days become catastrophic in that camp."

In New York, U.N. spokesman Sylvana Foa said aid warehouses and offices were looted in Goma and up to 60 vehicles stolen, bringing food distribution to an abrupt halt. Panic was spreading.

"The problem is we cannot control that fear because we can't even get out to the camps to show them we're still around," said another UNHCR spokesman, Peter Kessler.

Food was becoming desperately short in Goma stores and prices of staples such as flour, beans and fruit have increased fivefold.

About 100 foreign aid workers and reporters in Goma were trapped in their compounds Thursday by encroaching artillery fire and nervous Zairian troops patrolling the near-deserted streets.

UNHCR spokeswoman Sylvie Daillot said the agency decided Thursday to evacuate its staff from Goma, but doesn't know how they are going to get out.

An evacuation would take time, and would leave Zaire to deal alone with 700,000 hungry Rwandans, a task for which it has no resources.

The Zairian army told citizens in Goma to register their weapons and organize themselves into militias.

"Dig up your weapons and be ready for a fight!" a soldier yelled, driving back from Goma's front line.

Tutsis moved into the area north of Lake Kivu about 60 years ago, and have lived south of Lake Kivu for at least 200 years. Last month, Zairian officials ordered them to leave.

State Senator Stan Rosenberg's Fair Share Funding initiative.

Kerry began his response by asking Shackford if she was in costume for Halloween; he then said, "Just remember, Republicans trick. Democrats treat."

Rosenberg, who was in attendance at the forum, responded to the question.

"We can bring Fair Share Funding to the National level after we show them how to do it in Massachusetts," said Rosenberg.

Rosenberg's Fair Share Funding initiative mandates that students pay one–third of the price of their education in tuition and fees while the state pays two–thirds.

Kerry added that about 12,000 UMass students receive financial aid.

"There are a phenomenal number of students who can not go to school with out loans," Kerry said. "Obviously we need to make education more accessible through both Fair Share and Clinton's educational funding plan."

Clinton's plan will give $10,000 to college–bound students who need aid.

"We understand that the middle class and below need financial help, and that's what we [Democrats] will guarantee you," said Kerry.

"We need to open University doors to a greater number of students," Kerry said.

He added, "We need to make every effort to stop Republican cuts. The Republicans are cutting so much in order to make tax breaks for the wealthy."

"When will we cut the enormous amount of military spending?" asked Sonny Miller of the Traprock Peace Center.

"I have voted against Republican add–ons to military spending," Kerry said.

Kerry informed the crowd that over the last four years the government has spent more money on military research than all Bio–medical research in the last 100 years.

"The most important thing is not battleships or bombers, it is the education of American people," Riley said.

A disabled student asked the panel if it would be possible to make the campus more accessible for students with disabilities.

"There are 80 million students with disabilities; 75 percent who can and want to work," Kennedy said. "It is a failure of our whole society to move forward on this."

Kerry added that "UMass only received a tiny $13 million endowment for access; there must be commitment to making this happen."

A person asked the panel to address the fact that the study of Asian languages and literature has dropped their number of tenured faculty members from 10 to four, even though enrollment is rising nationally.

"This is a reflection of a small financial endowment," said Kerry. "That's where you pay the price."

Kerry added that this year Weld proposed $30 million in cuts to higher education, but the Senate and the House said no.

According to Kerry, 96 percent of classrooms and schools of Massachusetts need repair and upkeep, making them 49th in the nation.

"This is a clear reflection of neglect and a lack of adequate commitment to education," said Kerry. "We are not going to be the 49th, we are going to be the first."

Jewish students attend conference

By Bryan Schwartzman
Collegian Staff

Several area students spent this past weekend in Crown Heights, N.Y. getting a taste of traditional Lebavitch Judaism.

Yonnah Blum, program director of the area Chabad House, took five students to the Second International Jewish Leadership Conference of University Students. About 50 students, mostly from the United States and Canada, were in attendance. Blum said there will be another conference some time next semester and he would like more students to attend.

David Kauffman, a University of Massachusetts freshman said about the conference, "I was able to see things I've never seen before."

Esther Kumin, a sophomore physics and dance major at Hampshire College said the conference consisted of traditional Shabath observance along with forms, lectures and social events.

The Shabath, or traditional day of rest, consists of Friday night prayer and dinner and limits the use of appliances and automobiles from Friday to Saturday night.

Students spent the weekend with a host family in Crown Heights.

Kumin said that "at the end of the weekend, it felt like I was part of the family."

Kumin spent some time playing music with her host, Elie Winaker, a well known cantor and composer.

Kumin said one of the highlights of the weekend included a trip to the Ohel, a graveyard where religious figures such as the late Rebba are burried. Kumin said they light a candle, say some Psalms and write a letter to the late Rebba concerning spiritual issues.

"I put in a good world for my grandmother, who is ill." Kumin said.

Kumin also attended a panel given by women in the Lebavitch community speaking on feminist, religious and intellectual issues.

Blum said the students from Amherst received a special treat — a tour of the Mitvah Van. Blum said the Mitvah Van is a "Chabad House on wheels" bringing Lebavitch Judaism to the streets of New York. The Mitvah Tank is a motor home with Pictures of the Rebba and spiritual sayings on the outside.

"You can see [how the Mitvah Van] has changed people's lives."

Kumin said she was not certain if the event was going to have a lasting impact in her life. She said, "I look at life. Nothing drastic happens in a short period of time. Life is a process, life is a cycle."

Kumin said "Judaism is very complicated even for Jews. It's about attaining the deepest understanding possible."

Tyner pushes working class

By Victoria Groves
Collegian Correspondent

Jarvis Tyner, Vice Chair of the Communist Party (CP), USA, spoke to group of about 50 in the Student Union Ballroom Wednesday night concerning the upcoming presidential election.

As a 1972 U.S. Vice Presidential candidate for the CP USA, chairman of the party's National Commission, and writer for People's Weekly World weekly newspaper for the CP USA and the CP USA's theoretical journal, Political Affairs, Tyner spoke about the complexity of this particular election.

"I don't think this election can be defined by 'I don't like Clinton, or Clinton betrayed us,' he said. "I think that [that] is true, but this election is not defined by what you like. What's there to like? All of the candidates deserve dislike, but if you logically don't like Clinton, you ought to hate Bob Dole," Tyner said.

Tyner went on to say that if this election results in a major defeat of the right wing, it will definitely affect the future of American politics. He said that the motivation of voters to react this way is a result of the politics over the past two decades.

"Twenty years of declining income, two people in the family have to work to put food on the table has caused the standard of living for working people to go steadily down," he said.

For African–American voters, Tyner predicts that 80–90 percent will vote against the Republican party next week because of the roll back of civil rights that is anticipated to follow a Republican win.

"Rabid racism, chauvinism... dominate the Republican party. Under three percent are African–Americans and there are less women members than there were last year," Tyner said.

The Contract with America was also a focus of Tyner's lecture.

"The accumulated impact of the Contract with America and the basic ideas around it raise the spectrum of fascism. It is fundamental undermining of the democratic rights of working people," Tyner said.

The AFL–CIO, and unionized workers in general are supported strongly by the CP USA. They believe that the Contract with America is extremely anti–working class and is designed to cut the power of the people, as well as decrease welfare, civil rights, school loans and Medicare.

The Latino community and other organizations of color are now developing alliances with the labor movement to fight for jobs and unionization.

"They are fighting together to score a victory for the working class," Tyner said.

Jarvis and the CP USA support a number of policies to benefit workers. These include cutting taxes on workers by raising the taxes of the rich and cutting the military budget by at least half. Other areas of concern are the environment, and solving the problems of public school overcrowding.

He quoted Bob Sweeney, head of the AFL–CIO, who told people not to vote "like a Democrat, a Republican, or an Independent, vote like a worker."

He closed by saying "if voting ceases to affect anything, then... democracy ceases to exist."

This event was sponsored by the Anti–Racism Coalition, a Graduate Student Organization (GSO). One of the coordinators of the Anti–Racism Coalition and member of the W.E.B. Du Bois Club/CP USA, Colin Cavell, said that the reason for having Tyner speak at the University of Massachusetts was, "to defeat the ultra right in the upcoming elections."

Coordinator of the Anti–Racism Coalition and Chair of the W.E.B. Du Bois Club/CP USA, Fatima Ihsan spoke of the importance of bringing Tyner to UMass.

"The importance of bringing him here is to raise awareness among students in order to push working class agenda forward," Ihsan said.

Northeast hosts trick or treat for kids

By Mark McGrath
Collegian Staff

Halloween came early for a group of youngsters in the Northeast Residential area Wednesday night as they were welcomed for the second annual Halloween Fest celebration.

Halloween Fest originated last year as a means for providing underprivileged children from the Springfield and Holyoke area with a safe alternative to traditional trick or treat activities.

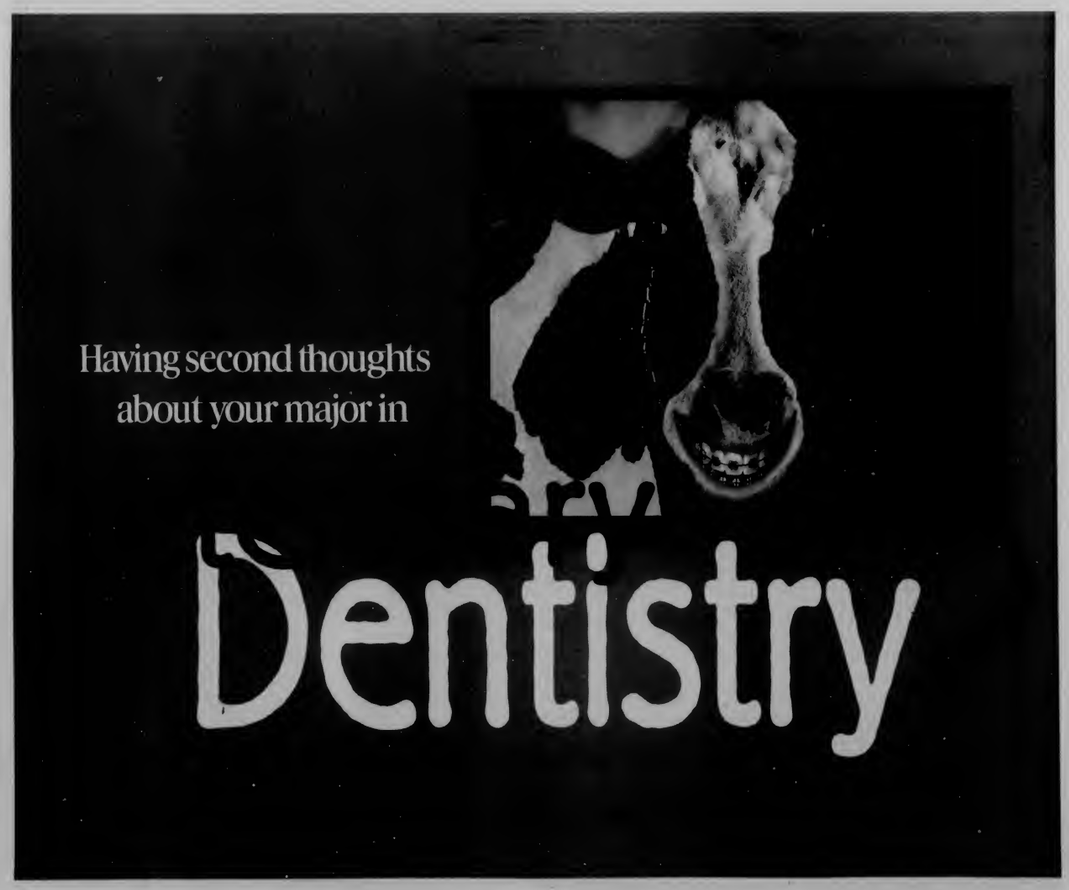
The event was organized by Residence Assistants Raymond Li and Rick Peltier, along with the Northeast Area Government and large numbers of students throughout Northeast residential area.

"I like just helping out the kids," Li said. "They may not be able to celebrate the typical Halloween in their neighborhoods."

Generous residents from each of the nine Northeast residence halls took part in the event, giving the children candy, chips and other ghouly treats as they trick or treated through the residence halls. One of the youngsters was happy with his candy catch, remembering how one resident gave them cans of soup and Ramen noodles last year.

The enthusiastic residents of Hamlin Hall created another scary, yet fun haunted house In what has quickly become a favorite tradition there.

"The haunted house was incredible," Li said. "I've been an R.A. in this building for three semesters now, and I'm still amazed with what they can do with a bowl of spaghetti, a bar of soap and a black light. Those kids were scared, but I think everybody had a good time."



The event is funded by the University of Massachusetts, the Department of Housing Services, Northeast Residential Area and the Northeast Area Government, who all pitched in for the round trip transportation.

Having pulled off the second event In two years, the coordinators will leave the event in the hands of Northeast leadership. Li and Peltier will have graduated by next Halloween, but know that their project will more likely be bigger, badder, scarier and sweeter than ever next.

"The way this thing is growing, the event will cover all of UMass by the year 2000," a pleased Li said as he looks towards the future but savors the past.

Media creates inaccurate Interworld

Jacob W. Michaels

Once again the Internet is in the news for a negative reason.

Recently, an America On Line user sent out an e-mail to thousands of users soliciting child pornography. He told anyone who might be interested that they could send him money and a picture and he would use a computer to put that person's head on a body having sex with a young boy.

And just a few days ago, police found the body of Sharon Lopatka in North Carolina. Lopatka had apparently willingly left her Georgia home to go to North Carolina, where she expected to be sexually tortured and then killed by someone she met over the Internet.

Ah, the Internet. The home of depraved, child molesting freaks of nature. At least that's what the media would have us believe.

Fortunately, it's simply not the truth.

There are hundreds of thousands of people on the Internet now. Most of them are no stranger than you or your parents, which is why you don't hear about them.

For most people these days, the Internet is simply a way to use e-mail and keep in contact with family and friends quickly and cheaply.

Others use programs like Internet Relay Chat (IRC) and Usenet to talk to people with similar interests.

Lots of people use the World Wide Web for research, to find out about their hobbies or just to say they're "surfing the 'net."

Some people even find someone with similar interests over the Internet and become friends. Sometimes they meet.

Even fewer people develop an Internet relationship. It can be easy to form an attachment to someone who is just words and interests, without the problems a physical presence can create. Most of these relationships end after some period of time, especially if those involved never meet. A rare few lead to marriage or a deeper relationship.

And then there are the "bad apples" of the Internet — the ones the media loves to focus on. These are the racists, the child molesters and the killers who find it all too easy to hide behind a computer screen.

But it's these last ones who get the bulk of the media's limited attention, which is too bad.

Granted, it is far easier to write a story about something strange or bad. The story of some women willingly letting herself be killed by someone she met through e-mail practically writes itself.

On the other hand, it's not as easy, or interesting, to write about a group of people from Britain, Canada and the United States who have come together through common interests and spend hours sending e-mail to each other.

But that's not the main reason there are so many negative stories.

Like politicians, and other people not actually using the Internet, it's easier to focus on the negative aspects — child molesters, children looking at pornography on the World Wide Web, etc. This, of course, just breeds more hysteria and criticism about the Internet and leads to laws like the Communications Decency Act.

It's time for the media to pay attention and stop giving this new form of communication a short shift. Like everything, there are problems with the Internet, but the positive aspects far outweigh the negative. The media, in discussing it, needs to show this.

Skinny doesn't mean sexy

Luke Meredith

I like big butts and I cannot lie...
You other brothers can't deny...
That when a girl walks in with an itty-bitty waist...
And a round thing in you face you get sprung...

I have to admit it. I like my girls with a little bit of meat on them. It's not like I'm after Roseanne or anything, but I find a girl who looks healthy very attractive.

Why do I bring this up? Because VH-1, MTV's subdued baby-boomer cousin, has come up with an awards show that some, including myself, would argue as a sign that the apocalypse is upon us. It's called the "VH-1 Fashion Awards," and they exist to honor the best in fashion, giving awards to such esteemed categories as Best Female Model and Best Designer. To celebrate this television landmark, the channel has shown a week's worth of "fashion programming," shelving, at least temporarily, their usual slate of Bonnie Raitt and Elton John videos.

Does anyone else see the inherent flaw in this whole scenario? I can't think of another single episode in pop- culture history that was as shallow and void of substance as this. I mean, VH-1 could never be accused of saving the world, but this is nuts. Who would watch this crap? Besides, giving trophies to people for being good-looking is disturbing, even though it means I'll have make room in the trophy case, again.

And by the way, anorexia is not sexy. When was the last time you saw a sexy picture of Kate Moss hanging up in a frat house? That's right, never. You know why? Because she looks as if she hasn't eaten since 1989. I think that if I ever had to take Kate out on a date, the first thing I'd do is rush her to a McDonalds and buy her a Happy Meal. Maybe she'd be able to return from the skeleton that she is and back to the real world, and she might even be able to wipe off that sad look she's always got on her face, because Happy Meals are flat out happy. I guess you need to look all intense and depressed when you say things like "Obsession, by Calvin Klein." Relax Kate, you look like a clothes-hanger.

And see ladies, that's the thing. It seems that I'm always running into girls who are starving themselves or are on a diet, even though they look hot. Why do you do that? I know you think we won't like you if we think you're fat, and I won't deny that looks play a big part in what we look for in girls. But how do you know what we want? Who ever said we like girls who look like sticks? The most unattractive thing a woman can do is go on a diet that will make her look as if she doesn't fit her body, because she's lost too much weight.

Now, I don't know if you ladies see these models and try to look like them, but you'll never see a guy pick up a GQ and go, "I simply must have Antonio's chest or nobody will ever marry me." See, us guys have figured out a secret you ladies would be wise to pick up on. We know that it takes a lot more than looks to be successful with the honeys. We know that being confident in yourself is the most important thing you can have as far as women go, and we feel the same way about women. Why don't you guys understand that a girl confident in herself and healthy is far sexier than a girl who is too skinny and has to look in the mirror every 10 minutes?

Oh well, I don't think I'll ever fully understand women. I think I'm a reasonably nice guy, but I know there are a few of you on this campus who would disagree with me. But whatever, the point is that we don't want you starving yourselves. Just look good, and we'll be happy. As Sir Mix-a-Lot once said, "36-24-36, only if she's 5-3."

Well, maybe 5-6.

Letters to the Editor

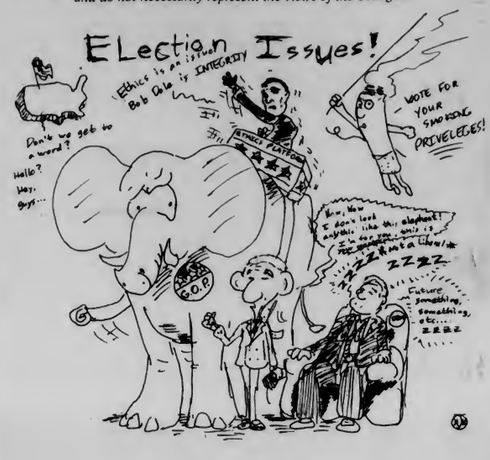
GEO struggle can improve education

To the editor:

Currently the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) is negotiating its third contract for all graduate employees, TA's, RA's, interns, etc. Our old contract expired this past June, and it has been extended month by month since then. The administration and GEO will continue to extend the contract until a new agreement or an impasse have been reached. Everybody will benefit if a new contract is settled as soon as possible, not only graduate employees.

Last semester the membership of GEO discussed the upcoming contract negotiations and four broad priorities were identified: improved health care, better child care, increased job security and higher wages. These four priorities have three things in common, namely reversing the trend of students paying higher costs for fewer services, increasing access to the University and improving the quality of a UMass education for all students, graduate and undergraduate.

When GEO's members originally talked about their vision for a better contract they fleshed out these priorities in more detail. Improved health care for GEO's members and better UHS services for everybody. Better child care is a pressing need, reflected in the appalling fact that the University's child care facility currently has only about 70 spots for our campus community of over 30,000 students and workers. Clearly, better funding of child care will result in increased availability for all parents on campus. Increased job security might mean the preservation of TA jobs and the guarantee by departments to fund TA's for several years, thus securing an income for graduate students beyond the current semester by semester struggle. Higher wages might just mean that the average TA makes a living wage, rather than the below the poverty line — $6,990 before taxes!



If the administration agrees with GEO's vision of a better contract all students will reap the benefits in the form of an improved education at UMass. When GEO members get better health care and get access to child care, they have to worry less about scheduling in a doctor's visit or obtaining a babysitter and thus have more time for office hours, class or lab preparation, or even a last-minute review session. Increased job security means two things for students. First, it means stemming the tide of larger and larger class sizes, which means more TA's to teach more and smaller discussion and lab sections and more instructors to teach intermediate level classes. The second aspect of job security means ending the semesterly scramble for funding that grad students are subjected to which in turn means that TA's will have the security to invest more time and effort into the material they teach, with the confidence that this investment will pay off when they are able to teach again the following semester. Lastly, higher wages mean that graduate employees do not have to take out a second job to make ends meet, which in turn means that they have more time for their own students.

Most importantly, better wages, greater job security and improved benefits will have the effect of making UMass accessible to the poor and working people whom it is supposed to serve. As a public institution, a central part of the mission of UMass is to provide an excellent education to those not able to afford a Harvard tuition. UMass also has the duty to ensure that its student body resembles the population as a whole, with private schools bound by no such duty. Improving access of graduate education through a better contract which includes a strong commitment to Affirmative Action will go a long way towards increasing the diversity of the graduate student population, making the University accountable to fulfilling its mission while improving the educational experience for all students at UMass. In order to realize this vision for a new and improved UMass, we need your help. Help us get a better contract for the graduate employees on this campus.

Burn out

Liana Melinnis

As of late, it seems as though I hear the same statement anywhere and everywhere I go: "I have to get out of here." I always nod my head in agreement. If there is anything worse than finals week, it's the mid-point in a semester, topped off by mid terms. We've been here at UMass for two months now, and at times it has felt like two years, while at other times, it has felt like two minutes. And of course when we want the time to fly by, it drags by especially slow. "Is it Thanksgiving yet?" has become the subject of every e-mail message I receive from my friends scattered throughout the east coast. I guess we're all going through the same thing; it does not discriminate, nor does it only affect UMass students, but all college students the same. Burnout.

You're tired, and no matter how much you sleep, the fatigue will not seem to go away. You sit in psychology lecture and with all your strength try to keep your eyes open and even when you do, Professor Boring becomes a blur and his monotone words begin to resemble those of Charlie Brown's unforgiving teacher, "mwamp mwamp mwamp."

Those obnoxious bells that we heard at least seven times a day in high school are now being missed at college, for there is nothing to wake us up except perhaps a kind stranger. So you sit in lecture, flip through your daily planner (there really aren't enough lines for each day I might add) and conclude that this has been Hell week, but wait a minute, wasn't last week also Hell week? Yup, this is mid-semester burnout. The very first thing you think about when you wake up at 8 a.m. is going to sleep at night: "only 17 more hours" you think, but this thought is no more comforting than the winterish chill in the air and the pouring rain.

In the past week, combined, my roommate and I have taken four midterms, written three papers, taken two quizzes and completed one computer program. At times like this I don't have too many words of wisdom to offer. All I can do is take each day at a time, and know that it'll get better, or else sacrifice the little sanity I have managed to hold on to. Everyone seems to have their own way of dealing with mid- semester stress.

The most common way, as I'm sure you can guess, is partying, hard. Others treasure a long hot shower and a good flick, some curl up with a book. I overheard a student who said "I just want to get out of here and go skiing, I can't wait." Those who can afford to get lost in the mall for hours, some are content just hanging out and others are satisfied getting stoned and listening to Pink Floyd. At such an emotionally and physically draining time, it is essential that individuals can seek some sort of refuge and in his/her own way, find some peace of mind.

And although midterms suck, and they really do, they can be helpful to some students. The mid semester point is a time to look back and reflect and a time to look ahead and plan. A lot can happen in the next month and a half — basically these next six weeks will make or break you. There is always room for improvement in all areas, and I am the last one to be optimistic, but it's true.

I, like many other students, am struggling to bring up my almost non-existent G.P.A., but I am doing it. I'm working two jobs, barely paying my bills and taking 15 credits. And yeah, there are times, often, when I feel sorry for myself, times when I wonder if I will ever get out of this hole. Phrases such as "I wish," "if only" and "someday" are often heard coming from my mouth. But I have learned, not by my own will, to live for the day and utilize what I have, even if it isn't much, because sooner than I even notice, it'll be finals and I'll really be in trouble. I am trying, desperately to take my own advice, but it isn't that easy. Part of me wants to crawl in bed, pull the blankets over my head and post a large "do not open 'till Christmas" sticker on me.

But then I hear that voice, that really annoying voice that tells me whatever doesn't kill me will make me stronger, and I have no choice but to get out of bed. I grew up hearing another cliché, that isn't as contrite as the previous and in fact, is pretty inspiring, "the past is gone, the present lost, as it arrives, there's only tomorrow." And pretty soon tomorrow will be Christmas, and even sooner, Thanksgiving.

A burning desire for change

Doctress Neutopia

I read about the life and death of Kathy Chang, also known as Kathy Change, on my Usenet newsgroup. A Net friend of mine from Australia posted it there for me to read. He and the others who read my newsgroup know about some of the struggles I have faced at the University of Massachusetts with people not taking me seriously as a scholar and as a human being. Ms. Change apparently had experienced these same kind of struggles at the University of Pennsylvania which led her to the ultimate act of social protest. She committed public suicide in order to bring focus to the cause of world peace because during her life, the message was being ignored.

While discussing the life and death of Ms. Change with students on the UMass campus, the students were bewildered as to why someone would take their life in that way. "Why," they asked, "would someone burn themselves for peace in the freest country in the world?" But I know perfectly well why change had been so desperate and frustrated that she used her body as a peace torch the way that Greg Levy, stepson of columnist Ellen Goodman and a former UMass student, did on the Amherst Common in 1990 during the Gulf War.

On my newsgroup, I have written about the oppression I and other like-minded individuals face at UMass as we search for a suitable forum to express our views so that change in the foundations of civilization can begin to significantly appear on university campuses. On my newsgroup, I have written about the alienation I felt while I was student and the lack of love and community there is at a highly bureaucratic and impersonal place like UMass. Finally, at the end of my formal education, I found the Internet and started a newsgroup to express my views about the corruption of UMass as well as the endeavor of trying to live a dignified life in a capitalist culture.

I was granted a research account from UMass to continue my work until UMass shut it down accusing me of breaking copyright law. I felt that it was only an excuse, just like when the administration killed the Future Studies Program, the only doctoral, interdisciplinary program of its kind in North America, in which I was enrolled at the School of Education. Their excuse for killing Future Studies was budget cuts, that they could not afford to fund the future. However, this was when they were building the multi- million dollar sports arena, the Mullins Center, from which basketball coach Calipari "graduated" to a $3 million a year job.

I am certainly not the only radical thinker that I have seen UMass officials eliminate from campus. During a WMUA radio show, when writer Jay Alain was speaking on why he got involved with civil disobedience at UMass, he was arrested. And, of course, the famous '60s political activist Abbie Hoffman was given a trespass notice from UMass after he joined with students who were doing civil disobedience against the CIA on campus.

UMass has a history of removing anyone who is making waves or who "looks strange or different" so that business can go on as usual. Administrators want to brainwash students with consumist values so that Global Corporations can continue to bring their fairs of plastic play toys, miniature sports games, poisonous junk food, fake beauty products and prizes of new cars and credit cards semester after semester to stupify students even more than the classroom already does.

Anyone who thinks that UMass is a peaceful place and who has no real concerns in life accept paying the bills, making good grades and finding a mate, has done exactly what UMass officials want you to do. It has done the job of indoctrinating you to fit into the status quo, join the middle- class and slave for the corporate rich for the rest of your life to pay back your student loans. And if you can't find a job with your degree, if your major is in humanities or the arts, well friend, UMass could care less that you are homeless, hungry and have no means to the communication technologies to express your true self to the outside world.

Now, can you understand why Ms. Change and Mr. Levy burned themselves in the cause of peace and liberty? I must admit that on occasion the hopelessness of the situation, the thought of self-immolation, joining them in an illuminous fire ball has passed my mind. But I am committed to getting my message of world peace and love out to masses of people through my World Wide Web site.

The Black Crowes shake Mullins' moneymaker this Sunday.

Black Crowes fly into Mullins

By Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

It's been a rocky rock 'n' roll road for the Black Crowes, whose latest tour, in support of their new album, Three Snakes and One Charm, brings them to the Mullins Center on Sunday night.

Anchored by Chris Robinson on lead vocals and brother Rich on rhythm guitar, the Crowes represented the replunging into '70s roots grooves so lacking in the dominant and redundant sea of '80s metal.

Their 1990 debut, Shake Your Money Maker, all but made the Georgian outfit the heirs apparent to the Allman Brothers Southern jam band throne. The Robinson brothers then fought some.

In 1992, they released their equally successful sophomore effort, The Southern Musical and Harmony Companion, an album featuring new lead guitarist Marc Ford. However, the Crowes had rather nastily disposed of Ford's predecessor, Jeff Cease.

In between albums, the Robinson boys fought some more. amorica, the third Crowes collection, received the most critical acclaim of any of their efforts, yet may have been felled commercially by a few factors.

The controversy fueled by the original cover — an American-flag print bikini displaying pubic hair peeking out of its edges — caused more than one major chain to refuse to sell the album until the unprovocative replacement art arrived on shelves a few weeks later.

In addition, the Crowes' pro-marijuana stance seemed to aid in their media-labeling turn from blues/rock to alternative band, which may have also affected their marketing and airplay.

And then there was that little feud between the Robinson siblings during the amorica recording sessions. That little feud which resulted in more than a few brotherly fistfights, as well as the near demise of the Crowes.

"We were going to break the band up," Chris Robinson said in the Three Snakes tour press release. "Last year we did six weeks in Europe and then three months in the States before we went back to Europe and did H.O.R.D.E.

"[For] that three months in the States, Rich got his own bus... Me and Rich — we've always loved each other, we just didn't like each other for a while."

Despite the differences that have peppered their working relationship, the Robinsons and crew have managed to produce a catalog of material that, while not always outstanding, is frequently ambitious and engaging.

This trend is even evidenced by their choices for the first two singles from Three Snakes.

"Good Friday" is a prettily arranged, gospel-tinged ballad which nonetheless drags a bit in Chris Robinson's overindulgent singing, while "Blackberry" is a funky little bit of post-Jagger swagger.

However, as album sales aren't as sharp as they previously were for the Crowes — Three snakes is currently struggling, and amorica barely scraped million-seller status, as compared to multiplatinum success for the two prior efforts — the road is where these boys get the job done.

Their electrifying live shows, marked by generously extended sets and fiery improvisation, have captured the Crowes a healthy and loyal fan base.

Thus, for lovers of their music, Sunday's concert shouldn't prove hard to handle.

The Black Crowes play Sunday at 7:30 p.m. at the William D. Mullins Center. Tickets are $20.50, and are still available at the Mullins Center Box Office.

Mule set to rev up Mullins crowd

By Joshua Boyd
Collegian Staff

GOV'T MULE
Live at the Roseland Ballroom
Foundation Records

Culled straight from their entire New Year's Eve '95/'96 performance with Blues Traveler in New York City, with, as the liner notes say, "no overdubs, no editing, no apologies," Live at the Roseland presents this energetic band of music veterans in the context where they are represented best — the live show.

Gov't Mule, opening act for the Black Crowes tour which hits the Mullins Center Sunday night, consists of two of the non-original Allman Brothers members — guitarist/vocalist Warren Haynes, and bassist Allen Woody — as well as drummer Matt Abts. Abts played with Haynes in original Allman Brother Dickey Betts' solo band in the late '80s.

The Mule start their set off with "Trane," a song that will hit big with fans of instrumental, relentless power trio jams reminiscent of Cream and early ZZ-Top. This song is obviously a paean to the great jazz sax player John Coltrane. There is fine, fine bass playing by Woody all through this 18 plus minute jam that swings between careening ensemble improv and the song's bluesy themes, where the tune shows great band chemistry.

After they've kicked out the big jams, Haynes steps up to the mic with that roaring voice he used to shout out his heavy "Mean Woman Blues," on the Allmans' comeback masterpiece Where It All Began. There are a few merciless rockers with this growl on it: "Temporary Saint," and "Painted Silver Light," so rocking, they could easily be heard in an auto-body shop.

A sense of Allman joy is displayed on the road-rock tunes, "Kind of Bird," and the closer, "Mule," the latter of which medleys in and out of Bo Diddley's classic "Who Do You Love?" The overall performance on the disc, with Abts' shrewd drumming, Woody's rolling bass and Haynes' various guitar voicings should provide for a full-octane, 6- cylinder, jacked-up tire '68 Camaro-kinda start to Sunday night's show.

Gov't Mule opens for The Black Crowes Sunday, November 3 at the Mullins Center. Tickets are still available at the box office in advance or on the night of the show.

Big Night a delicious tale of immigrant life

By Adam Levine
Collegian Staff

BIG NIGHT
Directed by Stanley Tucci and Cambell Scott with Stanley Tucci, Tony Shalhoub, Minnie Driver
Playing at Pleasant Street Theater

At the central core of Big Night lies an innocent and bittersweet tale of struggle. This is by no means a non- familiar premise, but the way in which the story revolves is completely sincere and hilariously played. The film explores many things, but in particular, life and food and the priorities we place on each of them. What makes Big Night original is how it combines these two factors and explains how the theme of struggle is intertwined within the two.

The film follows two nights and one day in the life of a pair of Italian immigrant brothers. They came to the New Jersey shore to open a traditional restaurant — not one that will serve spaghetti and meatballs just because that's what the American public wants. With a bank foreclosure threatening to close their restaurant, The Paradise, the two men must find away to secure their dream.

The brothers, Primo (Tony Shalhoub) and Segundo (Stanley Tucci) each want something different from their American experience, and the film is brilliant in exploring their individual desires. Primo, a master chef, is sensitive and shy as he struggles to win the affection of the local florist, but is hesitant in his confidence. Stubborn in nature, he would rather return to Rome than compromise his culinary skills on unappreciative American diners. Segundo has a very different attitude than his older brother and will feel no less self-worth by assimilating to popular culture. He understands and respects Primo, but will do almost anything to have him see it from his point of view.

The brothers marvel at the success of their local competitor played by Ian Holm, also an immigrant, but one who has succeeded with his restaurant. Holm's character offers spaghetti and meatballs on his menu because he knows that will make him rich. He decides to help out his young friends by giving them a chance to impress a famous jazz musician whom he has invited to their restaurant. The brothers hope that this opportunity will spread their talents by word of mouth and patrons will thus come. They spend an entire day preparing for the big night and the audience learns a tremendous amount about their characters in the meantime.

Although the story is both delightful and heartbreaking, the acting at times seems unstable. Much of the dialogue is too forced in an attempt to bring about charm and wit in the character's personalities. Ian Holm plays his role with an unconvincing eccentricity that leaves him looking nothing short of awkward. At times he bursts out in ridiculous fits of laughter and at other times he fnaists in compulsive swearing, which appears extremely out of character.

COURTESY ASYLUM ENTERTAINMENT
Stanley Tucci and Tony Shalhoub play Italian brothers in Big Night.

Where the acting falters the directing exceeds. Cambell Scott and Tucci use an interesting amount of slow and fast motion shots to add an exciting level of drama to balance out the heartfelt comedy. The scenes inside the restaurant are reminiscent of Martin Scoresese's Goodfellas. The camera quickly pans across the dining room, showing fascinating looking people eating fine cuisine and enjoying themselves immensly.

At Big Night's conclusion the viewer is left with a better understanding of the immigrants' struggles of the 1950s. What makes this film so pleasant is how it can combine this lesson with an entertaining story and refrain from being preachy in its attempt. Italian food lovers will be left mesmerized by how delicious the entrees appear, so be sure not to view this film on an empty stomach.

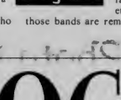
Altan brings music and spirit of Ireland to Noho

By Daniel Bodah
Collegian Staff

Traditional Irish band Altan have been getting rave reviews from the press for years, and I have no inclination to break the justifiable tradition. This is, straight out and whatever your musical tastes, a great band. They don't need to mix any rock or other music in with their folk, and they've wisely avoided doing so for the most part.

The founding members of Altan come from literally the same neighborhood where such Celtic traditional luminaries as Clannad, the Bothby Band and Enya grew up. Amazing how Gaoth Dobhair (Gweedore to all you English speakers,) an area in Ireland's County Donegal, has poured forth a river of jigs, reels, marches, polkas, adopted Scottish highlands, Strathspeys and hornpipes which through the various bands' albums have made this music renowned throughout the world. When I visited Ireland in 1994, I was surprised to meet a number of young Germans there who were big fans of the music, and said that trad (as Irish folk is usually called) was enjoying a good bit of popularity at home.

The band's latest album, Blackwaterside, is their first release of new material since the death by cancer of co- founder Frankie Kennedy in 1994. Lead singer and fiddler Mairead Ni Mhaonaigh (said "Ma-RAY-ed Nee WHEE- ney") has said that Frankie tried to prepare her (he was her husband) and the band to keep playing after he passed by insisting that they tour without him and keep the music of Altan alive. The new album has a song Mhaonaigh wrote for Frankie, as well as a string of excellent traditional tunes which haven't lost any of the joy or youthful spunk of previous Altan releases.



Other band members playing at the Iron Horse will be Ciaran Tourish, fiddle and whistle; Dermot Byrne, accordion; Ciaran Curran, bouzouki; and Daithi Sproule on guitar. Guitarist Mark Kelly joins the band only for European shows, and so won't be here for this performance.

The Iron Horse serves Guiness on tap, everyone: come Saturday night prepared for an evening of dancing and high spirits. Mairead's glowing golden singing, all in Irish, rises over the excellent, true-to-their-roots music — you may not know Irish, but the upbeat spirit is universally understandable.

Altan performs at the Iron Horse in Northampton on Nov. 2 at 7:30 & 10 p.m. Call 584-0610 for more information.

The decline and fall of the hardcore community

I think hardcore has hit a wall, and it's not a pretty thing. When bands like Minor Threat, Bad Brains, Dead Kennedys and SSD started playing no one had heard anything like it before. With the whole Youth Crew movement spearheaded by Youth Of Today, Bold, Gorilla Biscuits and Judge, the calls for unity and vegetarianism were also new. But now in 1996, has hardcore run out of ideas?

I mean how many songs can be written about being stabbed in the back? Earth Crisis has now released two albums, two EP's and one side project (Path Of Resistance) about veganism — we get the point already.

Do we really need bands like Ten Yard Fight, Floorpunch, or Cornerstone who are rehashing, some would say blatantly stealing, what a thousand bands have done before? The fact that a hardcore act like CIV is accessible to MTV is a sign that we need to rethink things.

Sure, there are bands like H2O and Ignite who manage to combine old and new styles with a fresh lyrical approach and who are representing hardcore to the fullest, but two out of a thousand isn't good.

We need to make hardcore offensive, fresh, progressive and threatening. Too often bands that accomplish that like Millhouse, Threadbare and the Rye Coalition are grouped into subgenres like emo. Not only do bands like this offer a new musical perspective I can guarantee you they will never be seen on MTV. While the music may be different, the rage and anger against societal norms demonstrated by those bands are reminiscent of Black Flag and Agnostic Front.

You, the hardcore fan, must think for yourself and try not to follow proven formulas from the past. Wear what you want to — not everyone has to wear baggy jeans and have a million piercings. Dance as hard and as violently as you want to, or stand still and tap your foot if that's your thing. Take a chance on a band you've never heard. Support the basement shows even if a Victory band isn't playing.

Bands, play as hard and as loud as you want to. Scream your head off and curse as much as you want to. Don't follow a norm; throw in weird, unexpected tempo-shifts and melodies. Question what people say. Simply because someone's in a band or writes a 'zine doesn't mean they are right about everything. Use hardcore to better yourself, not just to be part of a cool, alternative social clique. Finally do whatever makes you happy.

Festival to be celebrated at Bowker

By Seema Gangatirkar
Collegian Staff

In a spectacular display of pageantry, color and tradition, the Festival of Lights will be presented tomorrow afternoon at Bowker Auditorium. The annual event is a celebration of various religious and secular events from the Hindu calendar and is also considered the Hindu new year. The performance begins at 2 p.m.

The Leela Puppet Theater will open up the festival. Their performance, titled Tarot's Street Show, will feature string puppets from Rajasthan, India. Puppets include an acrobat, sword swallower and a gypsy dancer.

The Court of Heavenly Beings will perform against the backdrop of the Himalayas at 3 p.m. Following that performance, Ghazal singer Shanti Hiranand will perform.

Hiranand is the leading artist performing this traditional classical style of singing. Hiranand has sung on All India Radio for the past 46 years and she has performed in concerts throughout India and abroad. Recently, she appeared in the internationally acclaimed film, Siddhartha.

The Festival of Lights is the culmination of many religious events on the Hindu calendar. Among those are Ganesha Caturthi (Birth of the Elephant-headed god), Durga Puja (worship of the goddesses), Dussehra (killing of the demon king Ravan), Dipavali (lighting of lamps to welcome Lakshmi, the goddess of wealth) and Navaratri (nine nights of worship to the goddess Saraswati.)

This program is presented by the Asian Dance & Music Program at UMass.

A special noon presentation of "Yatra: The Court of Heavenly Beings" will be presented today at noon for public school children. Tickets for the Festival of Lights are $7 general admission and $5 for students, children and seniors. Please call the Fine Arts Center Box Office for tickets or information at 545-2511 or (800) 999-UMAS.

Bowker set for midday string concert

By Seema Gangatirkar
Collegian Staff

The Lafayette String Quartet will perform at Bowker Auditorium Sunday afternoon. The quartet, which has been described as "splendid... powerful and riveting in every way," will perform at 3 p.m.

The program will include Haydn's "String Quartet in F- sharp minor, Op. 50, No. 4," Beethoven's "String Quartet in B-flat Major, Op. 130" and a piece by John Burke.

The Quartet was formed in 1984. Since then, the quartet has achieved acclaim as one of the leading string quartets in North America. The Quartet is composed of violinists Ann Elliott-Goldschmid and Sharon Stanis, violist Joanna Hood and cellist Pamela Highbaugh Aloni.

The Lafayette String Quartet boasts of a matched set of instruments made by the famous Amati family. The instruments, which are owned by the University of Saskatchewan, were made between 1607 and 1690. The instruments were purchased in 1959 but were not played by any quartet on a permanent basis until the Lafayette String Quartet began its residency at the University of Victoria School of Music. The University of Saskatchewan then offered the instruments to the quartet.

The Quartet's playing has been described by the Rochester Times-Union as having "the kind of skill, insight and subtlety that you'll from only a handful of the best quartets anywhere."

Tickets for the Lafayette String Quartet are $20 and $15. Five College students may purchase tickets for $5. To order tickets or for more information, please call the Fine Arts Center Box Office at 545-2511 or (800) 999-UMAS. Bowker Auditorium is located in Stockbridge Hall on the University of Massachusetts Campus.

ers tend to get over- emotional easily, and right now we have been keeping an even keel."

The game plan is simple for Mallen this weekend, as even with two productive lines, led by the No. 1 line of seniors Tom Perry-Warren Norris-Rob Bonneau, UMass can not afford to shoot it out with the Terriers for a victory. The Minutemen will have to play well defensively, and while the first two lines must be at the top of their game, the rest of the team has to check and cover the puck well. It all comes back down to the basics, and each player will have to take care of one-sixth of their ice.

Mallen knows this fact, and junior goaltender Brian Regan, with his defensive backline mates of fellow juniors Brad Norton, Mike Gaffney and Tom O'Connor, will have to be at the top of his game.

"Whenever you play BU they have so much offensive power and speed, and you better be good defensively and keep them off the board as much as possible," Mallen said. "The thing we don't want to do against BU is take a lot of penalties, because their power play unit is always strong. For us, we have to capitalize offensively, and try to jump to our offense with speed and get good quality shots on goal."

At any time in recent history, this year's BU squad seems to be the most susceptible to defeat of any kind. With the loss of stars Jay Pandolfo, Mike Grier (Edmonton Oilers) and Chris O'Sullivan (Calgary Flames) to the NHL, the team that lost miserably to Michigan in the NCAA Semifinals last year by a 4-0 score appears to be somewhat weakened. Last weekend, their encounter with No. 2 Vermont kicked the terriers out of the top place in the East, as they lost at Walter Brown Arena by a 4-2 score.

Not true, as one of the greatest tricks that BU coach Jack Parker has pulled this season is convincing people that this team does not exist on the level of past success. The Terriers have their list of usual suspects returning, and they lineup from top to bottom. BU returns two preseason All-Hockey East selections at forward in junior Chris Drury (2a, 2pts) and senior Shawn Bates (1g, 2a, 3pts), with another HE selection in senior defenseman Jon Coleman (2a, 2pts). Although not a real strong spot for BU, junior goalie Tom Noble compiled a 15-2-2 record last year, with a 3.03 GAA and a .888 save percentage.

Mallen will not take any part of this squad for granted, and not even Kaiser Söze could pull the wool over his eyes.

"They did lose some big name players in Pandolfo, O'Sullivan and Grier, but they still have a very, very strong nucleus of guys that have played on a national championship team, and won a lot of games," Mallen said. "So, I think they still have plenty of firepower, and they have had an excellent recruiting class in Tom Poti and Dan Lacouture, and those are two of the best recruits in the U.S. They are not rebuilding, they are reloading."

Even considering that UMass is a relatively new program, and has only been in the best hockey conference in the country for two seasons, the 14-1 statement made by Parker last year can be considered a little overwrought. There comes a time when a team is maybe up by ten goals that you will back off the offense a little bit. Parker did not feel the need, and did what he felt was necessary.

But what he did not have in mind is that kind of defeat, bordering on out-and-out humiliation, can only motivate the losing team; especially the next time those two teams face each other. The past is the past, but Mallen can only scratch his head in wonder at what might evolve from this situation.

"They let the game get away from them, and we let the game get away from us. It was ugly, and the good news is that we get to play them again," Mallen said. "It was unfortunate, it happened, but I think it has made us prepare a little bit harder, and from every bad comes a good.

"From that loss there was a lot of humility that was dealt, but on the other hand, what comes around goes around. It may not be today or tomorrow, but it will be someday. We shall overcome. We will have to find a way to rectify that someday."

with those numbers."

Despite these minor obstacles, the Minutewomen are likely to bring another A-10 title home to Amherst.

Junior NCAA-hopeful Rebecca Donaghue finished second overall last year, and is the favorite to win the meet Saturday.

Katie Greenia is poised to finish closely behind Donaghue, and Christy Martin has a chance to finish among the top five.

And with strong performances from Sharon Tillotson and Molly Dunlap, the Minutewomen will look to roll over the rest of the Atlantic 10 this weekend.

"Keep an eye out for Tracy Meagher this weekend," LaFreniere said. "After a 65th place finish last year, we're expecting her to finish in the top 20."

Last year three of our runners finished in the top 10," LaFreniere said. "We have a legitimate shot to finish five there this year."

The Minutewomen are looking forward to returning to Van Cortland Park, after a performance last month in the Meet of Champions they'd rather forget.

"Our performance this weekend should be a real testament to how much this team has improved over the course of the season," LaFreniere said.

Women's crew novices get their chance

By Jackie Leroux
Collegian Correspondent

It is a time of firsts for the Massachusetts womens' crew.

Last weekend the varsity crew beat out 38 other schools to snag their first-ever Women's Championship Eight in Philadelphia.

It was also the first time a university has come up victorious in that regatta in 10 years.

This weekend the novices (freshmen) of the team will head to Hanover, N.H. to participate in their very first race: the Dartmouth Invitational. Although the race is an important one, because it is a first, the team is going into it with a modest goal, to simply finish.

In order for rowers to be able to participate in competition, they must first be cleared by the NCAA Clearinghouse.

The team has had problems with getting its rowers through the clearinghouse, so not all of the members will be available for Saturday's regatta. Unfortunately, this includes their best line-up.

The crew had hoped to send three or four boats to the race, but have only been able to get two boats cleared.

Coach Jim Dietz's only expectations are "that none of the boats will sink, and everyone will get through the first course."

The regatta, which is for novices only, will be against other local schools, including the University of New Hampshire, Northeastern and Rutgers. The Minutewomen are going into the race with little knowledge of their competitors, since it will be the first race for the other teams as well.

"It's hard to say how tough the competition will be, because it is a first for everyone," Dietz said.

The race is set to start at 11 a.m. on Saturday.

either intimidate the rest of the teams or make them work harder. What we have more than any other team is depth from the No. 2 to No. 5 or No. 7 man. If you take the front runners from all the other schools, we probably can't compete, but our depth can match up against any other school. Depth will be the deciding factor in tomorrow's meet," O'Brien added.

Van Cortlandt Park will host tomorrow's meet in the Bronx. The area is one of the oldest parks in the country, and has hosted more championship meets than any other in the nation.

"The real test will be the two miles in the woods. There will be no one watching from there until the final mile, so it will be every man for himself. That's why it will be nice to have a big group of men together in a pack," O'Brien said.

Youth is not a big factor in this meet. The meat of the team is made up of virtually all seniors. Unfortunately, so is every other team who was a factor last year.

"The team has focused and grown over the meets this year. And you could say we have gained some momentum in the last few weeks," O'Brien said. "We came in 11th at the Meet of Champions, seventh at the Paul Short Invitational, and we just had a good meet at the New England Championship, where we finished fifth. So things are looking up. It's going to be a good match up tomorrow, for all the schools."

O'Brien feels confident that his squad has a chance at repeating last year's performance.

"I think we definitely can win this meet. We are in the same situation that we were in last year, so nothing will surprise me. At the same time, if any other of the top four teams win, that will not surprise me either," O'Brien said.

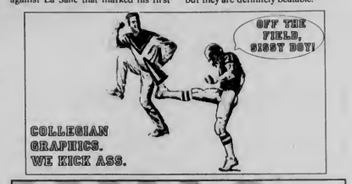
1.00 (0.96 gaa). They have posted eight shutouts in the 1996 campaign and they walked off the pitch the last three consecutive games with a goose egg hanging on the scoreboard underneath the opponents name.

The Rhode Island offense may be a concern for the UMass defense, but the team has proven that it can shut down high powered units. LaSalle, featuring the dangerous Cesidio Colasante, was held scoreless on Oct. 20 at Richard F. Garber Field, the only time the Explorers failed to score in conference play this year.



The Minuteman offense should keep Rhody busy as well. Top UMass scorers Mike Butler and Dave Siljanovski, have recently had the scoring burden displaced from their shoulders as other team members have found the back of the net in the last few weeks. Help has come from junior transfer Joenal Castma, who put away two goals in the St. Bonaventure victory to bring his season total to five, and senior Lee Marlow, who tallied the game winner against Duquesne.

Even defender Jon Hanna gotten into the act with a game winner against La Salle that marked his first career goal in a Minuteman jersey. Midfielders Rob Cairo, Scott Regina, Paul Corcoran and Tashi Tshering have been creating opportunities for a team that has outscored opponents 18–10 in Atlantic 10 action.

UMass' big guns, the 1–2 combination of Siljanovski and Butler, has been the consistent scoring story all year. Butler has displayed an uncanny knack for coming up huge in the big games sending the team to victory with four game winning goals. He leads the team with 18 points on the season, dividing his goals and assists equally with six. Siljanovski has also tallied six goals, which coupled with two assists, gives him 14 points on the year.

Siljanovski, though, has more at stake in Saturday's finale, as it marks the final regular season game of his collegiate career. He would like nothing more than to lead the team to its third straight appearance in the A–10 Championship Rap match. The road to that goal goes through Rhode Island this weekend.

Departing junior, Tobias Bremke, sums up the challenge simply stating, "I think it is going to be tough for us, but they are definitely beatable."

UM volleyball continues road swing

By Jeremy Adams
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's volleyball team continues its road trip this weekend against St. Bonaventure and Duquesne, after dropping its midweek scuffle with Connecticut on Wednesday.

Coming off of this season's high point to date, a home victory over the previously undefeated Atlantic 10 champion Rhode Island, the Minutewomen fell to non-conference opponent Connecticut 3–1 at Storrs, Conn. The loss dropped their overall record to 18–7.

Senior Dionne Nash recorded 21 kills and 19 digs in the losing effort. Freshman Sarah Watters continued to put up good numbers, adding 13 kills. Watters has brought her production up considerably since stepping into the line–up for the injured Lesley Nolan.

The freshman from Las Vegas, Nev. is the third rookie to start for the Minutewomen, as they are now playing with only one substitute. Against Rhode Island, Watters had 21 kills, 10 digs and was second on the team in total attacks with 56.

Massachusetts will put its A–10 record of 7–4 on the line Friday night at St. Bonaventure, and again on Saturday at Duquesne. In their previous meeting, the Minutewomen swept the Bonnies in three games at the Curry Hicks Cage to claim their first A–10 victory of the season back on Sept. 27. Match highlights included freshman Jill Meyers' 11 kills and seven block assists, and junior Michelle Paciorek's four service aces.

Massachusetts' last meeting with Duquesne was also a victory for the Minutewomen, 3–1 at home. Meyers once again came up big for the home team, with 21 kills and a .567 hitting percentage.

Sophomore Katie Pearce had a typically solid game against the Dukes, completing 72 setting assists. Pearce has put her own school record 78 assists on the line numerous times this season, including a 73 assist match, also in just four games, against Rhode Island, while tying the mark in a five game thriller at home against Virginia Tech two weekends ago.

The Minutewomen have not played well away from the Cage this season. Massachusetts is 11–1 at home, and 3–1 in neutral sight games, but have gone a lowly 3–5 on their opponents' courts.

Minutewomen Notes: Coach Bonnie Kenny is 86–42 all time at Massachusetts and is the winningest coach in Minutewoman history. This is her 13th year as a collegiate volleyball coach. The former captain of the Tennessee Lady Volunteers has coached her way to a 257–181 career record, including a nine year tenure at South Carolina.

Junior Lesley Nolan will be out of the line–up until the postseason, at the earliest. The outside hitter from Mission Viejo, Calif. has a stress fracture in her left foot which she had been playing with before taking to the sidelines. Nolan's 239 kills in 67 games played this season, a 3.57 average, still ranks her in the top 10 of the conference.

UMass won't play at the Cage again until it hosts Fordham and La Salle the weekend of Nov. 8. Its current road trip includes a stop in Cambridge for a match against Harvard on Tuesday.

University and Buffalo, outscoring them by a combined 105–46.

The Black Bears come into this contest with two powerful running backs to lead the ground game, as senior tailback Bob Jameson has 805 yards on 167 carries and nine touchdowns, while his partner Andre Pam has picked up 597 yards on 133 rushes and eight TDs.

As if the powerful Maine running game isn't enough for the Minutemen to concentrate on, the Black Bears have sophomore quarterback Mickey Fein who has thrown for 1449 yards, with 10 TDs, and eight interceptions. Junior wide receiver Rameek Wright is the leading receiver with 54 catches for 586 yards and five TDs.

The Minutemen all season long have prided themselves with the overall effort by numerous players on the squad to help contribute to every game.

Senior Ron Brockington leads the team in rushing with 525 yards and four TDs, and the Minutemen have had four different running backs rush for over 100 yards in a game this year, while 13 different players have carried the football.

Sophomore Doug Clark leads the team in receiving yards with 247 and is tied for second in receptions with 10. Along with running the reverse, Clark averages 20.8 yards every time he touches the ball.

Freshman wide receivers Torey Hamilton and Ralphael Quinn have come on as well to catch a total of 12 balls for 152 yards and one TD. Freshman quarterback Jeff Smith has passed for 495 yards and four TDs.

On the defensive side, senior linebacker Justin Reimer leads the conference in tackles with 110, and has moved within one tackle of fourth place on the all–time UMass list with 324.

Broadcast Notes: Tomorrow's game will be broadcast on 91.1 FM, WMUA. The pregame show begins at 12:15 p.m. offense, as they have notched four and three goals respectively. Michelle Young has picked up the slack in the assist department, recording four along with a pair of goals.

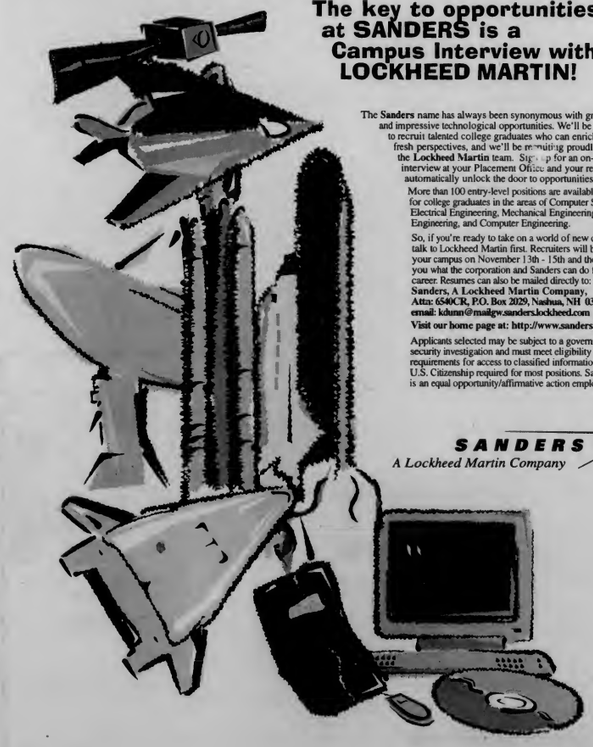
At the other end of the field, the Hawks have relied on Joan Fedesco in net. Fedesco has played in all but two games, when Celia Ashton got the start. Fedesco has stopped 103 shots on her way to compiling a .715 save percentage and a 2.72 goals against average.

For UMass, senior Kyle Rothenberger leads the team in points with 25, and is tied for the lead in goals with 10. She has also recorded five assists.

Sophomore Erica Johnston stands even with Rothenberger at 10 goals and has three of assists to her credit to rank second in points with 23.



Freshman Saskia Fuchs, junior Courtney MacLean and sophomore Kate Putnam follow in the standings, as Faces has connected for six goals, MacLean for nine and Putnam for three.

Faces also has 10 assists to her credit, while Putnam has nine.

The key to opportunities at SANDERS is a Campus Interview with LOCKHEED MARTIN!
The Sanders name has always been synonymous with great careers and impressive technological opportunities. We'll be on campus to recruit talented college graduates who can enrich us with fresh perspectives, and we'll be mentoring proudly as part of the Lockheed Martin team. Sign up for an on-campus interview at your Placement Office and your resume will automatically unlock the door to opportunities at Sanders.
More than 100 entry-level positions are available at Sanders for college graduates in the areas of Computer Science, Electrical Engineering, Mechanical Engineering, Aerospace Engineering, and Computer Engineering.
So, if you're ready to take on a world of new challenges, talk to Lockheed Martin first. Recruiters will be visiting your campus on November 13th - 15th and they'll show you what the corporation and Sanders can do for your career. Resumes can also be mailed directly to:
Sanders, A Lockheed Martin Company,
Attn: 6540CR, P.O. Box 2029, Nashua, NH 03061-2029;
email: kdunn@mailgw.sanders.lockheed.com
Visit our home page at: http://www.sanders.com
Applicants selected may be subject to a government security investigation and must meet eligibility requirements for access to classified information. U.S. Citizenship required for most positions. Sanders is an equal opportunity/affirmative action employer.

HOROSCOPES

ARIES
March 21–April 20

Fast thinking and good judgment may enable you to come out of a sticky situation smelling like a rose. Beware, though—if you get cocky, things could just as easily go completely wrong. Don't underestimate the complexity of the problem.

TAURUS
April 21–May 21

Your irritability level is high this week, especially when confronted by a chronic griper. Encourage them to come up with solutions and then help them channel their ideas to the appropriate people. You'll both appreciate the results.

GEMINI
May 22–June 21

A clever approach to problem-solving and an ability to communicate that knowledge with others makes you a very popular person this week. Don't be afraid to take on a little extra troubleshooting—it could be noticed by someone you'd like to impress.

CANCER
June 22–July 22

If there are decisions you've been putting off, now is the perfect time to finish gathering information and make a choice. Give yourself a deadline so you don't procrastinate further. Time is of the essence.

LEO
July 23–August 23

Adding a new ingredient to an old recipe for success could be just the ticket to snapping out of an old habit. Share your results with other people, but don't be surprised if they don't appreciate the significance of your discoveries.

VIRGO
August 24–September 22

Small delays this week mean huge setbacks later on, so be punctual and respect your deadlines. Take full responsibility for what happens, and you'll reap the rewards later on. A group effort leads to increased productivity.

LIBRA
September 23–October 23

Use all your tact in explaining your way out of a difficult situation. The possibility exists for you to make a dangerous enemy this week. Clear communication of your expectations and perceptions could be the key to wiping the slate clean.

SCORPIO
October 24–November 22

With the flick of your hand, you could cause big changes in someone else's life. Work to make this change a positive one. A domestic catastrophe offers you a great opportunity for a laugh if you give your sense of humor a chance.

SAGITTARIUS
November 23–December 21

A clean and neat work space frees you from digging through clutter and inspires you to feats of productivity. Sometimes it's just a matter of having the right tool for the job. Turn over a new leaf and surprise a friend with a thoughtful gesture.

CAPRICORN
December 22–January 20

Make the extra effort to get something right the first time, rather than fixing it later. You might make a big impression on a lazy person with your industrious example. You'll be teaching them a valuable lesson.

AQUARIUS
January 21–February 18

What seems like chaos could actually be a beneficial situation for you if you're willing to get your feet wet and wade on in. Show your willingness to be a team player. When things settle down, you could find that you've made one or two powerful allies.

PISCES
February 19–March 20

Paying close attention to details enables you to get your life back in order. Give yourself some leeway to become engrossed in work. Something that seems like a distraction could be the inspiration for some of your best work.

When my cousin Wes was 10 he'd spend the whole day at the amusement park. Over the big sound system he'd hear:

"WES, PLEASE GO TO THE KILLER LOOP."

Little Wes would get excited and run over to the Killer Loop, and stand there looking all around. He would always see somebody vomiting. No one would say anything to him, and eventually he'd wander away.

He never knew why they were calling him. This would happen 3 or 4 times a day! It started to make him sad and confused.

It went on for years... every summer, Wes would run over to the Killer Loop.

After he grew up, we all found out that the chief custodian at the park was also named Wes.

To this day Wes still gets an upset stomach when he hears his name over a sound system.

UMass looks to shoot down Black Bears

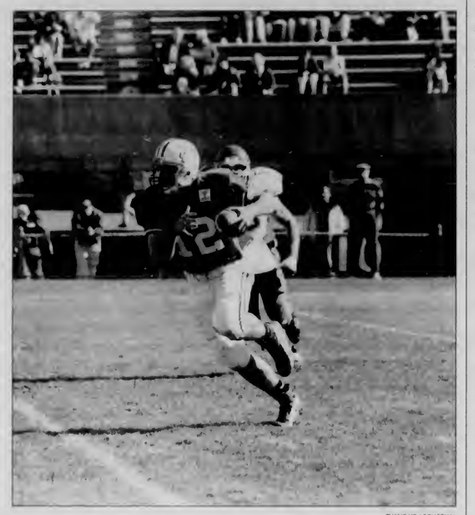
By Mike Corey
Collegian Staff

It all depends what view you take.

If you take the pessimistic approach, you believe the Massachusetts football team has no chance of obtaining the Yankee Conference title. However if you take the optimistic approach you still think they do.

The first of three conference games to end the season, which all must be won in order to stay in contention, begins tomorrow as the Minutemen take on the Maine Black Bears in a Yankee Conference battle at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium at 12:30 p.m.

Despite the 40–7 loss last week at New Hampshire, giving the Minutemen two losses in the conference, they still have a chance of obtaining their first Conference title since 1990. And knowing the character of this Minutemen team, it is taking the optimistic approach.



In order for UMass to have a shot at the title though, it will definitely need some help. There are four teams in the Conference, all in the Mid–Atlantic division, with only one conference loss: Delaware, James Madison, William and Mary and Villanova.

But first things first, UMass must control its own fate and get by Maine before anything else is possible. The Black Bears come into this game right behind UMass in the New England division of the Conference with a mark of 5–3 overall, 4–3 in the conference.

UMass is 5–3 overall with a 3–2 mark in the conference and is tied with New Hampshire for the top spot of the New England division. The Minutemen are in definite contention for the divisional crown, which has eluded them since 1993 when the league split into two divisions.

The Minutemen hold a 30–11–1 series lead over the Black Bears and are 17–2–1 in games played here in Amherst, however Maine has won the last three–of–four meetings between the schools, including last year's 24–21 victory in overtime in Orono.

The Minutemen have won the last five times at home dating back to last year, and are 3–0 this season with wins over Northeastern, Boston

Hockey faces BU in early grudge match

Tonight and tomorrow night, the Massachusetts hockey team (1–1, 1–1 in Hockey East) will be facing the best of Bean–town, as it will take on the No. 3 nationally ranked Boston University Terriers (1–1).

A win for the Minutemen would be an incredible measuring stick for the rest of the season, as the Terriers are the cream in the figurative Hockey East chowder.

But the last meeting between the two teams was more of getting beaten by an ugly stick, as BU felt the inherent need to run up the score in last season's conference quarterfinals, rolling to a 14–1 final.

After a 50–50 split with UMass–Lowell over the past weekend, the Minutemen have had a good week of practice to get prepared for this big early season test. Coach Joe Mallen has seen his team's hard work this week, and hopes their concentration is way up at 7 p.m. on both nights.

"We have had good focus, good intensity and I think the words to describe it would be business–like, which I think is good," Mallen said. "At sometimes with college hockey, especially with young teams, the play-

Rhody a crucial test for UM men's soccer

By Chris Krein
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's soccer team is on a roll it has no choice but to sustain if it wishes to challenge for the Atlantic 10 crown.

The Minutemen's post–season dreams hinge on their final conference game of the year. However, if recent success means anything, they carry a great deal of momentum into this weekend's showdown on the road against Rhode Island.

UMass has been on fire in the last two weeks, posting three straight shutout victories. The Minutemen have blasted through these must–win games, toppling LaSalle (3–0), St. Bonaventure (2–0), and Duquesne (2–0) to up their A–10 mark to 7–3–0. However, there is a logjam atop the conference standings, and their late success will be rendered meaningless unless they can produce a huge win over the Rams at 1 p.m. on Saturday in Kingston.

Unfortunately for the Minutemen the deciding game comes against a Rhode Island squad that has proved to be the team to beat all year long. The Rams are sitting alone on top of the conference with a 9–1–0 record and they have clinched a certain ticket to Dayton, Ohio for the A–10 Championships to be played November 8–10. They have locked up the regular season title and the No. 1 seed, so they have the luxury of waiting to see how the standings shake out.

The Minutemen are in the middle of the fight for the remaining three spots, and this weekend will finalize who is in and who is staying at home.

LaSalle (7–2–1), Virginia Tech (7–3–0), and Fordham (6–3– 0) are the teams scrapping with the Minutemen for those golden bids, each knowing that one team will be left behind to contemplate the could–have–beens and the wait–until–next– years.

UMass is in an enviable situation that is equaled with simple formulaic dictum — "win and in." Should the maroon and white tie or lose, though, they can still make the post–season, as there is a myriad of scenarios that could occur to let them slip in the back door. The complexities disappear if the Minutemen can walk off URI Soccer Complex with a victory, although that is going to be a task worthy of a Herculean performance.

Rhode Island enters the game as the most potent offense in the conference. It features an explosive frontline that has blown opponents off the field. The Rams have three players in the top six points leaders in A–10 scoring.

Leading the attack is the always dangerous Andrew Williams, a junior from Kingston, Jamaica. The 1995 All– American leads the A–10 in goals, assists and points (12 g, 14 a, 38 p) and over the entire season he has put up equally elite numbers (15 games, 16 g, 14 a, 46 p). He has rifled home three game–winning goals and he has captured the A– 10 Player of the Week award the same number of times.

Complementing Williams is junior forward, Brian Tucker, netting six goals in conference play to go with six assists. His 18 points ranks him third in A–10 play. George Pavlantos has posted solid numbers as well in 10 conference games (4 g, 5 a, 13 p) to place him in a tie for sixth place on the point–leader board.

The team has tallied 46 goals on the season in 16 games, an unbelievable average of 2.88 goals per game. To put this in perspective, the ferocious Minuteman offense has a 1.69 goals per game average, netting 27 goals in 16 games, that looks anemic in comparison.

Putting a stop to this scoring machine will not be easy, but the UMass bootërs bring in one of the top defensive units in the region. Lead by senior backs, Joe Jacobson and Dan Chagnon, and outstanding play by sophomore keeper, Jeff Jablonski, the Minutemen have allowed the fewest goals in conference play and they possess the only goals against average that is under

Field hockey can clinch title tomorrow

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

The regular season Atlantic 10 field hockey title will be decided tomorrow, when the Massachusetts field hockey team faces the St. Joseph's Hawks at 1 p.m. tomorrow at Totman Field.

The No. 8 Minutewomen, who have played their way to a 12–5 record overall and a perfect 4–0 conference mark, hold a one–game lead in the A–10 standings overall La Salle (3–1 in the A–10). The only conference blemish on the Explorers' record is a 5–0 drubbing at the hands of the Minutewomen.

With their spotless in–conference record, UMass has guaranteed itself at least a share of the conference title, and has assured itself of a place in the A–10 Tournament.

La Salle's spot in the tourney is also secured by virtue of its record; but St. Joe's, Rhode Island and Temple are all fighting to get in.

But before the Minutewomen can think about the postseason, they must first concentrate on St. Joe's.

Last season, UMass lost to the Hawks in an overtime 2–1 game in Philadelphia, in the last regular season game of the year. Hayley Davidson collected both scores for the Hawks in their first–ever win over UMass in the sport.

The Hawks (7–10, 2–2 Atlantic 10) trying stretch their season into the tourney, have dropped A–10 matches to La Salle and Temple. They are coming off a 5–0 blanking of Fairfield, a team they have held scoreless since 1988.

Leading the way for St. Joe's is Atlantic 10 co–Player of the Week Janna Watts. While Watts has scored a team– leading six goals this season, she has added 11 assists, for a mark which earns her a tie at No. 17 in the nation in that category.

A trio of Hawks stand with five goals, as Carolyn Wood, Shannon Feite and Mary Ellen Timothy have all found the back of the opponents' net multiple times. Wood has helped on six goals, while Feite and Timothy each have one assist to their credit.

Neither K.C. Dougherty nor Donna Burke have fed any goals, but each have contributed to the St. Joe's

UMass xc teams head to Atlantic 10s

Tough field faces Minutewomen in title defense

By Corey Goodman
Collegian Staff

It's showtime this weekend for the Massachusetts women's cross country team, when it travels to the Bronx's Van Cortland Park to defend its coveted Atlantic 10 title.

Last season the Minutewomen took home their third championship in five years, literally ripping it from the grasp of rival St. Joseph's, who went home broken–hearted, a mere three points shy of UMass.

"St. Joseph's lost several of their top runners," coach Julie LaFreniere said. "But they won't forget what happened to them last year, and they'll come at us with all they've got."

Though the latest Atlantic 10 coaches' poll favors UMass to run away with the title, LaFreniere is wary of more than just a hungry Lady Hawks squad.

"La Salle has a very decent shot to come up and surprise us," Lafreniere said. "They're ranked No. 2 in the Atlantic 10, and a few of their runners will run at the head of the pack."

Behind La Salle in the rankings is Virginia Tech and Rhode Island. Both schools find themselves in the upper echelon of the Atlantic 10, but still are considerably weaker than the top–ranked Minutewomen.

If there's a fabled "Cinderella" performance awaiting an Atlantic 10 team, LaFreniere thinks it could possibly come from No. 8 Duquesne.

"The coaches are really underestimating the talent level of Duquesne," LaFreniere said. "Though I'm not familiar with all of their runners, I know that their top three are all running under 19 minutes. We can't just brush off a team

Virginia Tech, La Salle set to challenge Minutemen

By Jonathan Place
Collegian Correspondent

Last year, the Massachusetts cross country team captured the Atlantic 10 Championship for the first time. This year it would love to repeat history, tomorrow in the Bronx.

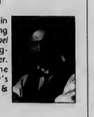
"Last year was the first time we won the Atlantic 10s and the same top four teams have only lost one player from each team. There will be no surprises, I know the teams we're playing against," UMass coach Ken O'Brien said.

The same four teams that finished behind UMass in the A– 10s last year, Virginia Tech, St. Joseph's, La Salle and Dayton, are now in front of it in the weekly coaches' poll, one day before this year's meet begins.

"I'm not worried that we lost to St. Joe's and La Salle earlier in the year, we have improved, and last year we were in the same ranked position going into the A–10 that we are now," O'Brien said. "This year is basically identical to last year's except this year we are more mature mentally as well as physically."

Historically, UMass has finished in the top five every year since the beginning of the conference in 1978. The Minutemen have finished second or third every year since 1985, until last year when they won the Atlantic 10 Conference Championship.

"Last year, we were the underdog. No one expected us to finish first. Now this year everyone is looking to us for a good performance," O'Brien said. "Last year was a career day for the team. You know you have matches where only 70 percent of the team performs well and about 30 percent does not. Last year during the A–10s everyone performed at their very best."



Strategy is extremely important in the five mile cross country run.

"What I will do is send seven or eight men to the front of the pack, where they will stay. They will

Works for Red Cross threatened by soldiers

KABUL, Afghanistan (AP) — Female Afghan employees of the international Red Cross stayed away from the relief agency's Kabul compound yesterday after Taliban fighters threatened to hang them. The threats were made by Taliban fighters who entered the Red Cross compound on Friday, when the offices were closed in observance of the Muslim holy day.
The fighters told Red Cross security guards "If we see any Afghan women in the compound, we will hang you, along with the women," said a Red Cross official who spoke on condition of anonymity.
The Taliban government, enforcing their strict version of Islamic law, barred women from working after capturing Kabul on Sept. 27. It later informally allowed women to continue working for some aid agencies who had been unable to maintain programs without women, but did not publicize the change.
Red Cross officials said they believed the fighters did not deliver the threat on behalf of the government, but were acting on their own. The 10 Afghan women employees of the compound were staying away until the issue could be sorted out, Red Cross officials said.

SJC to hear arguments on Mass. abortion law

BOSTON (AP) — The state's highest court will hear arguments tomorrow on a state law requiring girls under 18 to get the consent of both parents or a judge before having an abortion.
But it won't be just a legal fight between the state and Planned Parenthood, which is challenging the constitutionality of the law. It will also be a political minefield for pro–choice state Attorney General Scott Harshbarger, who fears his argument for the strict measure could hurt him with liberal voters two years from now, when he plans to run for governor.
To further complicate Harshbarger's position, he has filed friend–of–the–court briefs on Planned Parenthood's behalf in two other abortion rights cases — one of which also is scheduled for arguments tomorrow before the Supreme Judicial Court.
The anti–abortion group Massachusetts Citizens for Life says Harshbarger's position is a clear conflict of interest.
Philip Moran, the group's attorney, will argue tomorrow the case should be sent down to trial court and Massachusetts Citizens for Life, not Harshbarger's office, should defend the state statute. A Superior Court trial also would allow the group to cross–examine Planned Parenthood's witnesses and introduce its own.
"We just didn't think that Scott Harshbarger was the attorney general to represent the pro–life position, because of his publicly stated position on abortion," Moran said.

President rallies 25,000 in Springfield

Clinton prioritizes higher education, students; Questions linger whether promises can be met

ELIZABETH BROWN / COLLEGIAN

President Bill Clinton spoke last night in Springfield to rally support for the Democratic party.

By Michael Elliott and Raghuram Vadarevu
Collegian Staff

SPRINGFIELD — In 1960, then Senator John F. Kennedy came to Springfield the day before the election to convince voters that his administration would be one focused on the future.

New Analysis

More than three decades later, President Bill Clinton arrived in the same city evoking the same theme — "building a bridge to the 21st century."

In his address to approximately 25,000 people, Clinton urged voters to elect a Congress which would support the programs he says will lead the country beyond the year 2000.

These programs include several which will have significant implications on the accessibility of higher education.

At the event, Clinton recognized important congressional allies, such as Sen. John Kerry, Rep. John Olver (D– Amherst) and Rep. Richard Neal (D–Springfield) to advance and support his educational agenda.

Viewed by many students as supporters of higher education, the question must be how realistic are the aims of the Democrats in prioritizing education.

"He has opened the door of a college education to every single American," Clinton said of Kerry's support of federal financial aid programs which Republican legislators attempted to cut last fiscal year.

In addition, Clinton said, Kerry has supported social entitlement spending and programs designed to protect the environment.

Kerry, no doubt, appreciated the campaign plug, as did Olver and Neal, both of whom are on the '96 ballot.

Clinton praised Kerry, Olver and Neal for their commitment to what he referred to as "the politics of issues," and not "the politics of insults," and "division."

"We are moving in the right direction," Clinton added.

That direction may result, he said, in a federal tax credit, making two years of a community college education available to most Americans.

Further, Clinton will propose a $10,000 tuition tax deduction, coupled with other aid programs, such as AmeriCorps and direct lending.

While these proposals were met

Rally decries racism at UMass as students protest store, paper

By Jonathan Liberty
Collegian Staff

A rally was held on Friday on the Student Union steps which served as an open forum for discussion about racism at the University of Massachusetts, specifically at the University Store and the Massachusetts Daily Collegian.

Over 250 people gathered to hear a variety of students address the Oct. 5 Incident at the University Store, in which a student of color, Pierre Arthur Elysee, was incorrectly stopped for shoplifting, and the alleged lack of Collegian coverage of the ensuing events.

"We need to bring forth the fact that racism exists; ALANA (Asian, Latino, African, Native American) students are constantly threatened at this University," said Student Government Association (SGA) President Maurice Caston.

Caston added, "We need to stand today in unity to create a community in which all are welcome."

A University student, who identified himself as Shaggy, read a poem called "Natives," which brought forth many cheers from the crowd.

"The shackles of racism will be taken off," said Shaggy as he ended his poem.

Within the poem, Shaggy called for a boycott of both the University Store and the Collegian.

Elysee also called for a boycott of the Collegian today. Because there was no front page coverage/photo of a rally held by Elysee and friends on Oct. 18, while there was front page coverage of a rally at Smith College, Elysee encouraged the crowd not to read the Collegian.

"My friends and I were surprised that our rally was not on the front page," said Elysee. "We feel that the Collegian mishandled the issue."

Elysee's rally did receive coverage on the Black Affairs page. The Collegian planned to have a large photo of the rally on the front (News) page. The photo would have drawn attention to the story about the rally by including "see related story" in the caption.

However, "A photo technician, who has since been fired, did not pick up the photo assignment by the time the rally took place," said Collegian Managing

Audience responds to Clinton's visit as president gives support to Kerry in last days before election of 1996

By Joseph Fountain
Collegian Staff

SPRINGFIELD — It was a cold beginning for most people waiting to see President Clinton and hear him speak.

The average wait was two hours, though every spectator had entered Springfield Court Square before Sen. John Kerry was finished introducing the President. The crowds were well behaved and had some interesting things to say on the President coming to Springfield.

"It's a monumental occasion to have President Clinton here in Springfield," said Professor of law Gabriel Chin of Western New England College of Law.

"Western Mass. is usually ignored in state politics and in this senate race it could be the deciding factor," said Chin, who, like the president, is a graduate of Yale University.

The people who came to listen to Clinton speak were mixed in age.

One young Clinton supporter, an 8th grader, said of Clinton "He sounds like a good guy."

Most of the people who waited the two hours were in a good mood though several people complained about long lines and what seemed to be bad planning. A Springfield police officer said the crowds were moving very well. A secret service agent also said that it was a normal crowd for a presidential appearance and agreed that the crowd was moving well.

The majority of the crowd was made up from students attending the area colleges.

Many of them had different reactions to seeing the leader of the country.

"It's very cold out here, I just hope I can see him," said Scott Gouen, physical therapy major at Springfield College.

"It is a sign that he is strong and is certain of victory in Massachusetts. He's here to ensure a Kerry victory," said Julie Garcin.

There were groups of students from Harvard University, Bay Path College, the University of Massachusetts and many other area schools.

Other government officials closer to home also attended the Springfield rally.

"I think it's good for our city and state to have the president come and visit," said State Rep. and UMass alum Benjamin Swan (D–Springfield).

There were also pro–life demonstrators outside the rally. Bill Cotter, president of Operation Rescue, said that their goal was to get the message across that abortion was wrong.

Among the spectators there was also a number of people who were wearing stickers promoting Weld for senate who said they also supported the president.

A University of Hartford student said, "Bill Weld should be in the Senate and the president should get re–elected."

Many people started leaving after the president began to speak. Many who were leaving said they wanted to beat the traffic home and would prefer to watch the rest on TV.

Story promises fight for higher ed. & Fair Share

By Beth McCarthy
Collegian Staff

State Rep. Ellen Story (D–Amherst) co–sponsored the Fair Share initiative during her four years in office, and said that she would continue to support higher education as well as Affirmative Action if she were re–elected tomorrow.

The Fair Share program plans to have the state pay two thirds of higher education while students will only be required to pay one third, which basically consists of tuition and fees.

"Stan Rosenberg and I are the co–sponsors of [Fair Share]. He's the lead sponsor in the Senate and I'm the lead sponsor in the House," Story said. "That's going to be my top priority for this new legislative year."

Story said that she was pleased that students have become much more involved in politics by registering to vote, particularly because it makes the education issue a much higher priority.

"Students and their parents can call whoever the representative or senator is from their district to say, 'look, are you supportive of higher public education? Of the University?'" said Story. "People in the legislature are now taking funding for the University much more seriously."

Story reasoned that supporting the University of Massachusetts will not only be beneficial to students, but it will also continue to benefit the economy and employment rates for Western Massachusetts.

"The University is a major part of the economic health of the state," Story said. "It makes sense from every viewpoint because the University is also the largest employer in all of Western Mass. and all of the four counties."

Because of her close ties with the University — her husband also being a professor at UMass, Story said that she was confused as to why her competitor, Terry Franklin (I– Amherst), would say that she thought of students as simply children.

"I think that's a peculiar thing for him

Franklin hopes for a win the second time around

By Beth McCarthy
Collegian Staff

Terry Franklin, competing for the position of State Representative, said that he is "not running against Ellen Story. I'm running for the office."

Having previously lost to incumbent Story in the 1992 primary as a fellow Democrat, he is running again this year as an independent, "leaning towards a moderate libertarian stand," for the Third Hampshire District which includes Amherst, Pelham, and Shutesbury.

Franklin, who is currently employed by Kinkos and the William D. Mullins Center, said that he did not have any delusions of winning this election.

"I'm a long shot, but I think there's a slim chance of winning," Franklin said. "One reason is because Ellen doesn't seem to be running. She's not campaigning at all."

Franklin compared the race as one of the turtle versus the hare.

"She's taking the voters for granted and I'll have some chance of catching up on her," Franklin said, comparing himself to the turtle and Story to the hare.

Franklin said the two main issues he is be running on are marijuana legalization and Affirmative Action. These issues fall under his general concerns about big government, he said.

"The amount of regulation the government puts on the people has always bothered me," Franklin said, stressing the war on drugs issue. "People in authority who are opposed to marijuana, use it as a scapegoating issue to blame all of the problems of society on one group of people rather than address the real issues."

Active advocation of legalizing marijuana, however, has become an issue for him only in the last five years, Franklin said.

Franklin said that it was about five years ago that he was pursuing a relationship with a woman whose mother had contracted cancer. He said this woman felt that if her grandmother were given marijuana, it would have relieved some of the pain from the chemotherapy sessions.

"At the very least medical, but I'd like to see across the board legalization," Franklin said.

As far as Affirmative Action is concerned, Franklin said that he was against it "because I'm against all discrimination and I feel that Affirmative Action is a form of discrimination.

"You don't end discrimination with more discrimination," Franklin said. "It has bad effects within groups and outside of groups. It's convincing people that they need help."

Other issues that Franklin supports include anti–death penalty, legal abortions and civil rights for all groups including

Rally

Editor Chris Taylor Conner.

Elysee has changed the boycott to Wednesday, saying, "Since we have to read the coverage of our rally, we have decided to boycott the Collegian on Wednesday instead."

"We make ourselves accountable for our mistakes," said Conner, "If they feel that a boycott is necessary to make their voices heard, then I understand the action."

The rally continued in an open forum style.

The President of the Pakistani Students Association (PSA) gave support to Elysee.

"We will not tolerate this; as long as racism is there, so are we," said the PSA president.

President of the Haitian Students Association Frantz Bien– Aime spoke to the crowd, "All people have to come together; we should not have to deal with this today."

Kenny Lacoste, President of the Black Student Union, said that this incident is not just a University Store issue, but it is an American issue.

The University Store has stopped using under–cover student security to apprehend shop–lifters since the incident took place.

Elysee brought other issues to light about the University Store at the rally.

He pointed out that out of 300 University Store employees, less than 10 are students of color, none of whom work in security. Yet according to Elysee, Elizabeth Dale, Director of Business and Facilities Services, said that there were 25.

"Perhaps Affirmative Action has already been abolished in the security department of the University Store," said Elysee.

Graduate Student Prasad Venugopal questioned the University Store, stating, "What kind of system do we have in which white students are paid to follow students of color around a store?"

"This is a racist system, we need to stand against it," he said. "We are not going to tolerate it anymore."

Venugopal added, "Every day, we need to stand up; one day 20,000 students will stand together to say, "We're not going to take it anymore."

'Aren Lee Kong offered another perspective at the rally.

"It's fine to talk and to point; and it's cool to have a rally, or boycott the store or the Collegian. But none of this means anything," said Lee Kong.

"If you're just talkin', It's just straight up bull [expletive]," said Lee Kong.

Lee Kong stressed the importance of student involvement through the SGA, the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy and Registered Student Organizations.

Elysee ended the rally, which he coordinated, by leading the chant, "As long as racism persists on this campus, so will we."

There will be a meeting, titled, "Meeting to Address the Racism within Your Campus Center/Student Union Complex" on Nov. 7 at 5:30 p.m. The time is yet to be announced. For more information students can contact the Campus Center/Student Union Commission at 817 Campus Center.

UMass Police Dept. offers training on rape defense

The University of Massachusetts Police Department will be offering a 12–hour specialized training program, called Rape Aggression Defense (RAD) training, to all female students and staff on campus.

According to Deputy Chief Barbara O'Connor, RAD students will learn how to develop a "defensive mindset" by first learning how to avoid attacks, and later receiving instruction about practical and physical defensive moves.

Students will be able to develop, enhance and practice these moves in the class. A realistic simulation will be included at the end of the course.

The RAD course requires students to attend all four three– hour classes, offered Nov. 11, 13, 18 and 20, from 6:30–9:30 p.m. As the course progresses, each class becomes more and more involved, so students must attend all four to become a lifetime member of RAD.

There is also a course fee requirement of $25, and a limit of 16 students per class. Membership is a first come, first serve basis.

All interested women must register today at noon in the Police Department lobby in Dickinson Hall. For registration, bring a $25 check payable to RAD—UMass Police Department, and a current UMass student or staff ID. No phone–in registration will be permitted.

with a noticeably rowdy approval from the University of Massachusetts Minuteman Marching Band, students must ask themselves if the Democrats are simply pandering for their votes, or if another Clinton administration can realize a college education which is more affordable.

Kerry, after all, only came to campus to discuss student concerns after realizing the registration drive created 8,000 new voters (13,000 system wide) that might vote for him.

Clinton, as well, appealed to young voters during his speech — remembering how their vote helped propel him into the White House in the last campaign.

Should students trust his sincerity?

With a federal budget already strained with the burdens of deficit reduction, Clinton may not be able to deliver on his promises to make college cheaper and, simultaneously, protect Medicare, Social Security and the environment.

The real task of students will be beyond the ballot box if they hope to hold Clinton accountable. A responsible student voter must become a student advocate.

gays, lesbians, bisexuals, and transgenders.

"I also feel very strongly on court accountability," said Franklin, using the fraternity incident last February in which a woman had reported being raped at one of the fraternity houses, resulting in a social ban of the entire Greek community.

"I think that's an appalling injustice," Franklin said. "Broad numbers of people are being held accountable for the one act of a single person."

According to Franklin, he would also fully support all aspects of education, beginning at the kindergarten level.

"There's no controversy or contention there," Franklin said. "Any legislation is going to try and get as much money for UMass they can. Anything I can do to support education I'll do so."

Franklin said that most politicians tend to ignore student concerns, but he not only knows the faculty at UMass, but he is also a "supporter of student issues."

"I think [Story] treats faculty as her peers and students as children," said Franklin.

Franklin said that he feels he is qualified to hold the state representative position if elected because of his prior experience on a national church board.

"I had lots of parliamentary procedure experience," said Franklin. "I know how legislation works and I get along with people. I don't make enemies."

Franklin said that he was primarily counting on student votes to push him into office.

to say and I don't know what he bases that on," Story said.

According to Story, she has frequently been involved with students, including an appearance at UMass to speak with students about leadership and one at Amherst College to talk to students about getting involved with their elected officials to do something about child hunger.

"I've had a number of student interns from the University who've worked in my office and been enormously helpful," Story said. "My current aide is a 1994 graduate of UMass."

Story added that she is also in complete support of Affirmative Action. She said that people tend to misunderstand this issue.

"Affirmative Action, to me, does not mean hiring someone because this is a person of color, or because this is a woman or a person in a wheelchair just because they are a minority," Story said. "You don't put someone in a job they are not qualified to do."

Story said that her idea of Affirmative Action is that, when there are two applicants who are equally qualified for a position in a predominantly white business, the applicant of color, should be hired over the Caucasian one.

"We need to start adding more diversity into the work force to reflect our society, because our society is not all white," Story added.

It has been difficult for Amherst voters to determine the stands of candidates for state representative on these issues this year due to the campaign's low profile.

Story said that because Franklin does not appear to be campaigning, she has not done so herself.

According to Story, because Franklin has spent very little money to purchase flyers, she has been fortunate to "spend not one penny on my own campaign."

"I'm really not campaigning since Terry has not done a lot of active campaigning and hasn't spent the money to put signs up and those kinds of things," Story said. "It has meant that I haven't really had to do that either, and so I've been able to spend my time on the very close race with Kerry and Weld."

Clinton for President

Robert Kennedy once said, "Some people look at America and ask why, I look at America as it might be and ask why not?" During his first four years in office President Clinton has recaptured this uplifting spirit to better the nation.

Four years ago Clinton squeaked by then-President George Bush with less than 40 percent of the vote. Since then Clinton has made believers out of doubters, even in the midst of controversy. Meanwhile the Republicans have attacked him without presenting any real programs or vision of their own concerning the future of America. The country is in better shape than it was four years ago; Clinton deserves four more years to implement his agenda and lead the nation into the 21st century.

While far from the perfect candidate, he remains the best choice for students as well. His Americorps Program has altered the path toward the 21st century. He supports financial aid and has worked to increase assistance for students. For us students, as well as the elderly and the middle class, a vote for Bob Dole is a vote against both our own interests and America's. Clinton appears to be the President of the future while his main opponent Dole represents our problematic past.

Dole has run an ineffectual campaign touting a 15 percent tax cut that would lead to soaring inflation requiring major cuts in Medicare and many other vital social programs; largely because the GOP is totally unwilling to cut corporate welfare.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian feels a vote for Bill Clinton for President of the United States serves as a vote for our future.

Kerry for Senate

In the race for the Senate, residents of Massachusetts are lucky to have a choice between two very qualified and experienced candidates. Incumbent Senator John Kerry and Governor William Weld have been running neck and neck for months now. Nine debates over the last six months have shed light on the issues and where the candidates stand. This race, which is considered by some to be the most closely watched in the country, will indeed go down to the wire.

The election may in fact be more than a vote for the Senate. It could very well provide a glimpse at the course that government will take over the next 20 years or at least the presidential race in 2000. Kerry is representative of a socially conscious government, with more programs for the poor and working class. Kerry is a man of the people. Weld, on the other hand, has cut government at every possible corner in an attempt to "downsize" government on the state level. It's questionable at best if a Weld in Senate could do anything other than be a puppet of the GOP.

Coming out of the blocks like gentlemen, their race quickly turned into a mud-slinging fest equal only to the Kennedy/Romney race in 1994. The two candidates share much in common from their plush youth to their Ivy League education. Yet they are vastly different in their views.

Kerry, who has already garnered endorsements from The Massachusetts Teachers Association and the Massachusetts Federation of Teachers, has been and will continue to be supportive of education. He has fought proposed Republican education cuts and favors a $10,000 tuition tax deduction for working families. He is passionate in his fights for higher education and is a loyal friend to students.

During the Vietnam War he served in the Navy and was highly decorated for defending his command of men. When he returned to the United States he started Vietnam Veterans Against the War. Kerry has worked tirelessly on the issue of POWs and MIAs and has tried to normalize relations with the Vietnamese government while searching for the answers to the questions of whether Americans are still being held in Vietnam.

Some of his other noted accomplishments have come in the areas of banking and finance, where he was a key member in uncovering the Bank of Credit and Commerce International scandal. He also served as a pivotal member of the Iran-Contra hearings and the Savings-and-Loans bailouts.

If there is a shadow over Kerry's tenure during his current term, it's his support for the Republican Welfare Reform Bill. This vote was uncharacteristic of his usually socially conscious voting pattern, but this lone vote does not tarnish his outstanding record when contrasted with Weld's vehemently anti-poor and anti-welfare sentiments.

Weld has claimed to be in favor of education, but as governor, he has hurt higher education at every turn. Weld has consistently chosen to ignore the plight of college students. In the arena of public education he wants to abolish the Department of Education and has been an advocate for school choice, a program that perpetuates segregation in the public schools.

In his attempt to streamline government, he has also worked to privatize many traditionally state-run operations. This has saved money at the cost of massive lay-offs. Weld's moves towards privatization have only hurt the working class forcing them to struggle financially without union support.

Although Weld has achieved success as governor, he has done little for students and working people. While his popularity may be high, this does not mean he deserves to be our next Senator.

Therefore, the Collegian endorses John Kerry in the election for U.S. Senate.

Olver for Representative

Few public officials are as important to this University as Congressman John Olver. A former University of Massachusetts professor of chemistry, Olver has been a tireless advocate for UMass. The Massachusetts Daily Collegian supports his re-election.

While the federal role in higher education is limited, Congress controls the purse strings of some of the most valued financial aid programs, such as the Federal Direct Lending Program.

When Republican leaders in the House have attempted to cut aid expenditures last year, Olver ardently defended student interests.

He has repeatedly welcomed UMass students into his office in Washington to listen to their concerns and has often visited campus for a variety of functions.

While it was appreciated that his opponent, State Sen. Jane Swift, accepted an invitation to debate Olver on campus (which he declined), her positions on education are both unimaginative and counter-productive.

Saving money by eliminating the Department of Education, as Swift has proposed, by no means guarantees success. She has offered no assurances that financial aid programs administered at the state level would create less bureaucratic road-blocks and free up additional financial resources for students.

Her support for Gov. William Weld in his campaign for Senate is also troubling. While she asserts that she will be an independent voice in Congress, few freshman members can resist party pressures from its leadership. Swift will undoubtedly offer her support to the anti-student conservative agenda.

Olver's record goes beyond education. His stance on the environment is solid, as are his positions on affirmative action, entitlement programs for the poor, elderly and the unemployed, all of which he strongly supports.

His reputation on Capitol Hill is one of a hard working representative who can be trusted. This strength is crucial for the continued viable of programs which benefit UMass and western Massachusetts.

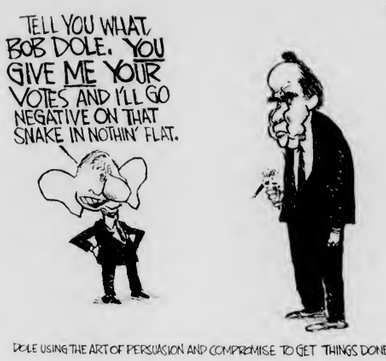
Other election issues

While many students' attention has been focused on the races for President, Senate and Representative from the First District, there are many other important choices on the ballot tomorrow.

Despite the local attention given to the First District race, students registered in Hadley, South Hadley or Northampton are in the Second Congressional District; their candidates are Richard E. Neal (D), Mark Steele (R), Scott Andrichak (I) and Richard Kraynor (Natural Law).

Students registered in Amherst also have the opportunity to vote for state representative. Rep. Ellen Story (D) is running against little-known Terry L. Franklin (I). Story has long been a supporter of the University, and education in general, in Boston.

Franklin, in a statement in the Boston Globe's voter's guide about education, said "Communities must live within [their] means. [The] state [is] useful for administrative reductions and liability limits."



For all of her past service, and her attention to matters that are important to students, the Collegian supports Ellen Story for state representative.

Lastly, for Massachusetts residents, there is one state-wide referendum on the ballot this year. Question One proposes a change in the hunting and trapping laws by prohibiting the use of certain traps for fur-bearing animals and eliminating some restrictions on who may serve on the state Fisheries and Wildlife Board.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of the Collegian Editorial board.

DOLE USING THE ART OF PERSUASION AND COMPROMISE TO GET THINGS DONE

Does it really matter?

Mike Burke

Few things in politics are a surer bet than who Massachusetts will vote for as President. There is a good reason why Bay Staters often chimed in "Don't blame me" as Nixon and Reagan ran our country into the pits. Heck, Massachusetts probably would have voted in Dan Quayle if he ran on a Democratic ticket.

Knowing that Clinton is virtually guaranteed to take home Massachusetts' 12 electoral votes, one must ask if this election process is really democratic. Or is it just another gimmick to maintain the power balance?

For the past 200 years there has been heated debate around the electoral college, especially at times when the popular winner did not take home the Presidential bid. In 1888, Grover Cleveland beat Benjamin Harrison 48.6 percent to 47.9 percent, but lost in the electoral college 233-168.

To find a more recent example of electoral debate look no farther than 1992's election where third-party candidate Ross Perot gained 20 percent of the popular vote but didn't gain a single electoral vote.

While many polls claim a majority of American voters feel the electoral college is unjust, (a constitutional amendment was almost passed in 1977) support for the 200-year-old method has been negligible. But now, a Massachusetts Institute of Technology-trained physicist is claiming that the electoral college is mathematically the best way to choose a President.

Alan Natapoff first gained public attention as an adamant supporter in the 1970s to maintain the status quo concerning elections, but now on the eve of the 1996 Presidential Election he has released a major mathematical proof of why he thinks the electoral college works.

To simplify the proof for the rest of the non-M.I.T trained world, Natapoff compared the electoral college to the World Series. In baseball's fall classic the victor is not the team who scores the most runs overall but the team who groups their runs together to win games. It sounds so simple, but is it?

In the recent issue of Discovery (Nov. 1) Natapoff looked back at the 1888 election, "[Cleveland, who won the popular vote] lost the five largest states by a close margin...so he scored more runs, but he lost the five biggies."

Natapoff continues looking at the power of an individual voter. In a national election based on popular support, one voter has much less of a chance of influencing the outcome than if that same vote only counted towards a state election. Natapoff sees the electoral college giving, "every voter the largest equal share of national voting power."

This train of thought directly relates back to James Madison's reasoning in Federalist 10, in which he warns of the dangers of majority factions. He felt the electoral college would "thwart an overbearing majority" unlike a direct election.

Natapoff summed up his theory, "The theorem essentially says that you're better off disricted in any large election, unless every voter in the country is alike and very closely balanced between candidates A and B. In that very extraordinary case, which rarely, if ever, occurs in our elections, it would be better to have a simple national one."

Even as Natapoff throws complex numbers around in his proof as crazy as a Phil Niekro knuckleball, I question its validity and usefulness. Perhaps his theorem works on a national level but for citizens of a strictly partisan state such as Massachusetts, does my vote contain the same power of, say, of a vote in a swing state such as California or Texas? Their votes, in theory, could alter the history of the nation while my vote, no matter who it is for, will be lost among a flood of pro-Clinton support.

Even if the entire state of Massachusetts west of Worcester voted for Dole, Clinton would still win by a landslide. So tomorrow as you cast that vote, consider Natapoff's ideas but question the very process that hints at this undemocratic system.

The new world order

Matthew Wurtzel

Who ever told Bill Clinton "it's the economy stupid" back in 1992, hit the nail on the head. However, Clinton, the media and other politicians were too short-sighted to actually realize the true ramifications that economics has upon politics. Whenever our economy goes through a dramatic change, so does politics.

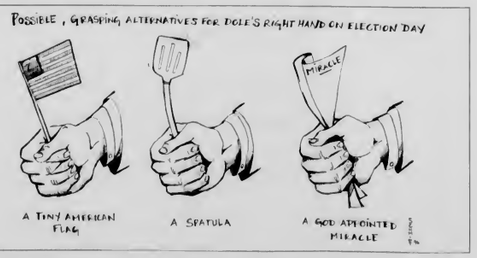
The Industrial Revolution was a huge economic innovation. The way goods were produced dramatically changed. Skill was no longer necessary to produce quality goods. Time was saved, making our economy more efficient.

With the changes in production, came great changes in society that ultimately lead to political reforms. Not only did universal suffrage eventually evolve from the Industrial Revolution, so did the roles and dominance of the political parties in our two-party system. Republicans took the helm during our Second, or Scientific, Industrial Revolution in the 1890s. Their dominance ended shortly after World War I.

Following the roaring '20s, the Classical economics that drove the economies of developed countries began to buckle, and in 1929 it collapsed — the Great Depression paralyzed the world. With the economy's collapse, came another political change. Keynesian economics replaced Classical economics as the preferred school of thought. The Great Depression and Keynesian economics ushered in a Democratic era in American politics.

Keynesian is a bottom up approach. Keynes' basic theory suggests that to lessen the effects of depression, the government should provide income assistance to people so they can continue to buy goods and services. Income assistance keeps demand high, and Keynesian theories argue that demand drives the economy. However, Keynesian theory also demands that countries run deficits during depressions and recessions, and to offset the deficits run surpluses when the economy booms.

The policies of the Republican era favored businesses, and the economy boomed. Competition was fostered under anti- Trust laws like the Sherman and Clayton acts. However, when the inherent flaws of the Classical theories became evident, change was in order. Change came with the Democrats who administered the right medicine for the time. They assisted the common Joe, and gave him Social Security, Deposit Insurance, the Minimum Wage, Medicare, inexpensive higher education, and the list continues.



In the 1970s, our economy began changing once again, and is still changing. When these changes began, Keynesian theories could not explain the simultaneous unemployment and inflation known as stagflation. All changes take time and may be measured in decades rather than just years. The Industrial Revolution did not occur over night, nor did the switch from Classical Economics to Keynesian Economics. Now our economy is going through a period of de- industrialization.

An industrial economy primarily produces goods which are tangible. A political science professor once said, you can drop a good on your foot, and it will probably hurt; but you can't drop a service on your foot because it is intangible. Today the U.S. economy produces services. The Massachusetts economy is primarily driven by financial firms like Fidelity Investment, other mutual funds, and insurance companies. Before de-industrialization, our state was once known for such industries as textiles and shoes.

The original Keynesian Economic theories may no longer apply to a modern de-industrialized state. However, the Democrats and Republicans continue to cling to old theories, so their roles are becoming marginalized. Until new economic theories are embraced by the major parties, politics will remain unstable. No revolution will occur, but Congress will continue to wildly swing between the two parties. Two term Presidents like Ronald Reagan and Bill Clinton will become the exception rather than the norm. Whichever party embraces the new economic theories that will replace Keynesian theories, will dominate the American political landscape until the next economic change.

When George Bush said a New World Order was upon us, he was right. Unfortunately Bush, like Clinton, didn't understand his utterance. Welcome to the new world order.

Conference deals with improving education

Gregory Casimir
Collegian Staff

After the spring of '96, a large number of black students did not return back this semester due to poor academic performance, and severe trouble with financial aid.

While this is an alarming fact, this occurrence is indicative of a disturbing trend that has been affecting the black men of the University of Massachusetts for many years.

Men of color (which includes Dominicans, Puerto Ricans, Haitians, and all West Indians) have had substantial problems in terms of student retention, and graduation. The percentage of students of color that actually graduate after entering UMass their freshman year decreases every year.

The University has also had trouble maintaining its population of ALANA (Asian, Latino, African, Native American) men.

Students are now beginning to take action to address a situation they regard as intolerable.

A meeting took place in early October which included men from different RSOs and organizations on campus to discuss an agenda in which certain institutional steps would be taken to implement a plan to help the men of color survive in UMass; not just academically, but to also help give them some guidance in their overall college experience.

It was out of this meeting that the concept of the Men of Color Conference was formed. Taking place on Nov. 8 to the 11th, the first annual Men of Color Conference will focus on four pertinent issues for men of color: 1) social identification, 2) academic success, 3) surviving the University, and 4) what the future holds.

James Callahan, of Phi Beta Sigma Fraternity Inc., is the executive director of the Collegiate Coalition of Black Men for Community Consciousness (CCBMCC) in charge of the conference.

Callahan explained the whole purpose of the conference was to motivate men of color to be proactive in defining their experience at UMass.

"Traditionally men of color make up the least population of people on campus who graduate," he said. "Especially after spring of '96, many brothers didn't come back. This created an air of uneasiness amongst men of color.

"Therefore, a meeting was held about being proactive about dealing with the problem. This conference also serves to define our own experience in an attempt to understand what precludes us from graduating," added Callahan.

Callahan expressed that he had a moral obligation to start this conference. "The same pitfalls that befell brothers years ago are affecting us today. Typically, the University has become a revolving door; most of us coming in are the ones going out. I felt a moral obligation to leave UMass better than I found it."

But sometimes it is hard to define where the problem is. Is it something that men of color are doing wrong, or is there a problem on the part of the University in terms of helping them?

Callahan expounded on the fact that it was a twofold issue.

"First and foremost, UMass is supposed to be a market of higher education and thought. It should ensure that the majority of its apprenticeship succeeds at UMass," he said.

"To do this, the University needs to take into account that the experience of men of color is not the same as whites. UMass must systematically put into place methods that allow its students to excel in all facets of the college experience: social, academic, financial, in career development, and cultural perspective," Callahan explained.

The second part of the solution, Callahan pointed out, lies in individual accountability. "However, this doesn't absolve the individual from taking responsibility for his own actions; when given the information on how to succeed."

In general, Callahan voiced that the Men of Color Conference is an invaluable opportunity for students to get proactive in shaping their environment.

"This conference will allow students to deal with issues critical to their academic advancement and enable them to change the culture of UMass," he said. "As opposed to tearing down our University, instead we will build it up to help UMass help us."

One time for the mind: intellectualism is the key

Allana E. Todman

Where are the black voices today in the college community? What is our purpose as people of African descent in a collegiate environment at a predominately white populated school such as UMass? Do we have a voice, or are we still echoing the voices of those who were active in the past?

College organizations like SNCC (Student Nonviolent Coalition Committee), a group that took direct action to fight for inequality, was one of the most effective and influential college campus organizations formed during the 1960s.

With sit-ins, boycotts, and other efforts like the Freedom Rides, there were a large majority of students all throughout college campuses that became indignant when it came to inequality.

As students, due to new laws made from the Civil Rights movement, we are able to be served and we are able to purchase goods from department stores. But who says that tension does not exist, or that I won't be followed around the University Store when I want to purchase gas-X?

As students who will be entering the new millennium, we are the products of the generations that experienced all forms of hostility before us. Believe me, we still have a long way to go. We are the legacy.

Intellectualism is the first step we must take in order to effectively use our minds to figure out historically how we, as a black race, have been affected both socially, culturally and in our education.

"The forbidden topic is, shh, slavery and the behavioral, mental, spiritual and money problems it created... African languages were illegal to speak. Reading was illegal to learn. Writing was illegal too. During and after slavery, most of us Africans were stripped of the knowledge to answer even the simplest questions in life," wrote Sister Souljah in her book "No Disrespect," where she speaks of the isolation, separation, and deletion of African pride, theory, knowledge and principles that was shattered due to Europeans feeling threatened by the early African ways of civilization.

Although we, as black people, have always looked to the church to give us spiritual encouragement, we need to be able to channel our faith through God in an intellectual way in order to develop a plan in which we can allow the legacy of equality to remain alive.

In looking at where we are in the '90s, we need to claim our education and not think we are here to receive it. When we claim, we take what is rightfully ours. When we receive we take what is given to us.

"We have pioneered civilization here, we have built up your country; we have worked in your fields and garnered your harvests... Do we ask for compensation for tears you have caused... we are willing to let the dead past bury its dead, but we ask now for our rights," Henry Turner said.

Turner, a man who escaped debt peonage and taught himself how to read, was the first black in 1868 to serve on the legislature of Georgia. A man who had to "sneak" away in order to educate himself used his knowledge in a powerful way, allowing his mind to be the tool for how he could contribute to the fight for equality. Turner claimed his education.

Don't feel in any way that because we can now come to a University as this, that we were given a gift. Let's not take our education for granted.

Race, Sex and Social Class and The History of the Civil Rights Movement, are some of the courses that many of you ALANA students are involved in. In order to channel these courses in allowing you to develop stronger convictions and pride, you need to do your own research about the information being given to you. There are two sides to every story.

The library would be one of the best places you can start. Going onto the fourteenth floor of the library, there are many historical informative books written by many black authors about black issues. Ranging from economics, the family, relationships and political issues that have effected our community, this will be a great way to begin to shape your foundation in an intellectual way.

As motivational speaker John Hope once said to a group of college students in Nashville, Tenn.:

"If we are not striving for equality in Heaven's name, for what are we living? I regard it as cowardly and dishonest for any of our colored men to tell white people or colored people that we are not struggling for equality...Be as restless and tempestuous on the boundless sea. Let your discontent break mountain high against the wall of prejudice and swamp it to the very foundation."

And that's one time for your mind.

Is you really you?

Emie Michaud

I was sitting in the BMCP (Black Mass Communication Project) office, trying to type up a paper, when a grad student (who will remain anonymous) entered. He presented flyers to an upcoming event and inquired as to where to hang them. I noticed the flyers and made some comments that were both negative and positive which, of course, caused him to sit and discuss the beef that I had. Very soon we got into a discussion, that most individuals who are involved with RSOs usually get into:

What are the organizations on this campus doing to uplift the community as a whole?

Now, in my mind, I immediately answered plenty. However, my verbal adversary felt just the opposite. He felt that, first, all these organizations did was have parties and large social events that did not promote self. I disagreed and said that if these organizations did not exist then individuals would have no concept of self at all.

Our disagreement boiled down to one thing:

Why divide ourselves into groups that we did not create in the first place? Why place loyalty to a culture that is only half your own?

An argument which has a lot of validity to it. Why do we separate ourselves along lines that colonists drew to basically divide and conquer our African ancestors? Is it because we must be at peace with our immediate labels in order to come to terms with who we are as Africans? Or are minorities, like adolescents entering high school, not ready or knowing how to accept the ideas of self or true heritage?

Therefore, it is necessary to introduce pride at the primary stages. It is easier to instill pride about one's parental background then it is to explain pride in Africa, a continent on the other side of the world that they probably have never been to. This idea of dropping all cultural pride and taking up the flag of ancestral awareness and pride was so ludicrous that I banished the argument from my mind.

Now, thinking about the argument, I realize that he was somewhat right. As minorities, we take pride in cultures that were given to divide and conquer us. We are stuck in a twoness as W.E.B. Du Bois described, "One never feels his twoness, an American, a Negro; two souls, two unreconciled striving, two warring ideals and one dark body."

Therefore, our goal is to recognize that we are part of what the colonist has suppressed us with, but we are also African. Though we are two, and half of our culture rejects us, we must remember that we have derived beautiful traditions from what they have suppressed us with and what we originally were. We should be proud of what we are no matter what because that is what we are and we cannot change that. The sooner we accept the beginning we can perceive the larger picture.

I am a woman, black and Haitian and in order for me recognize the beauty of all my dimensions I had to first accept myself in small terms, which was as a Haitian. Then I could see myself as an African. Then, lastly I could see myself as a woman, the creator of future generations.

So, my whole point is this: accept who you are spiritually, physically, mentally, and consciously. Then work to improve who are and become who you want to be. Subconsciously, you already know who you are. Make that inner self a true realization. Come to terms with the true knowledge that you will be exposed to. Do not fight those that wish to help you expand. This is not limited to Haitians, blacks or women; it goes for all those who wish to find out the truth within the self.

Black light: "Room 307"

By Humphrey brown III
Collegian Staff

This is the first in a series of articles geared towards shedding some light on the various RSOs and cultural organizations on campus. This week, the Black Light shines on the student run television show "Room 307." One of the founders of "Room 307," Chris Noel, spoke to us on keepin' it real, UMass and where exactly the name "Room 307" came from.

Black Light: Who is "Room 307"?

Chris: "Room 307" consists of the original founders; Ibrahim Ali, Mike Butler and myself. We have a lot of new members, you know, helping with the show. We have Tyrone [Tugwell], an old time member, Danny Torres, Carlos Anderson, otherwise known as Person, Armondo Hernandez, who's a freshman and Phil Robinson, who's a junior. That's as deep as we go.

Black Light: When did "Room 307" begin?

Chris: "Room 307" began my freshman year, fall 1993. We basically had a video camera and decided to go around the dorms filming weird stuff we saw. And we basically decided to start our own video show off of it, with music videos, 'cause we didn't have the resources like that up here already. We didn't have no BET three years ago, so it was just "Room 307." You know what I'm sayin'? So we just took that and made our mark.

Black Light: How did the name, "Room 307," come to be?

Chris: It came from the actual room 307 In Gorman. Basically that was our chillin' spot. That was like "The room." Everyone from two or three years ago knows that that was the hot spot. That was where everything was at, so we named the show after that room; room 307.

Black Light: What was 307's original purpose and does it still hold true today? Was the focus you had then still the same focus now?

Chris: The main focus, basically, was to be a multicultural show that was real. You know, Everyone at UMass stresses multiculturalism, but we're the only show that really had episodes where we had Indians in our room, white people, Chinese people, Spanish people and black people all vibin' and all talkin' about the same topic. And it still remains true to that, because, like with our live show, basically anyone can call and that's 25,000 potential students who could be watching the show live and could call. And that's with any race.

Black Light: What's in a typical 307 show?

Chris: Format-wise it's always the best hip-hop, the newest hip-hop videos. Because all the record companies know about us, they send us everything. As soon as BET & MTV get it, we get it too. But, our basic format is to, basically, give people knowledge. You know. Every show has a point. We're not just buggin' out or somethin'. We try to teach people awareness about stuff. Like, a lot of stuff that people might not know just because they've been in a society or community surrounding where they might have not experienced stuff. So, our job kind of is to relate all of that stuff to everyone who don't know and the people that do know can help along with it, because they understand what we're saying. But, for the people that don't know, it's about education. You know. That's the format of our show, basically; education, knowledge and music videos. That's how it is. Beats, rhymes and life.

Black Light: So, what's in the future for "Room 307"?

Chris: The future? Me, personally, I'm a senior. Mike's a senior. We're all getting old. Ty's still going to be around. You know. We still have young good people. We're still recruitin' people, but our main goal is to have, basically, 307 forever on the UMass campus. That's by passin' it down to people who are going to take care of the show and keep the same values that we had when we started the show, that made it so famous and so popular around this area. You know. We're going to come back when we're CEOs of some company and there's going to be 307 still on T.V. and we're the original founders.

Black Light: When does 307 run?

Chris: It comes on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays at 8 p.m. and that's our taped show. Usually it'll have some footage from a backstage of some concert or the interview of any artist that might be up here or maybe it just might be some on scene location stuff. That's the taped show, where we tape in music videos and we edit all that stuff in together. You know. Then we have Sundays at 8 p.m., that's the live show and that's basically where people can call in and request their own videos. The reason we started that is because they have this thing in New York called New York Flava Videos. And it's basically the same format, but they don't talk about topics. You just call up, pay $2.50 (it's a 900 number) and you get videos on T.V. or whatever. So, we kind of wanted to relate the same kind of thing up here, because it's free to call into the studio and we kind of wanted to let people program their own show. Monday, Wednesday, Friday at 8, we basically do the show, but on Sunday, everyone does the show. You know? We don't put any videos in. We let people choose the videos. If there's no videos chosen, then we'll just talk about whatever subject, but it's up to the student population to program the show every Sunday.

Black Light: You mentioned famous recording artists that have come through "Room 307" in the past. Who were some of them?

Chris: We've interviewed such stars as Faith Evens, Smooth Da Hustler, Trigga the Gambler, Grave Diggas, Artifacts, Common Sense, De La Soul, Tribe Called Quest, The Roots, The Beatnuts, Onyx, Dionne Farris, OGC and Boot Camp Clik.

Black Light: Any last words on what 307's about?

Chris: I think the campus needs "Room 307" and even though a lot of people don't know about it, a lot of people do like the show because it's real. Like, now we have Headline News and CNN, BET so we're on top of all types of news. Whether it's in our community, which we probably see on BET or whether it's the world or the nation, which we'll see on CNN or Headline News, that's the media.

That's what their producers are telling them to tell people what's going on. What we're seeing and what we're feeling, especially in this community, and everyone feels the same way we do. So, we're just like the representatives of our community at UMass. The thing we're trying to do is just get people knowledge, get people to start thinking, get people to be real. That's what the show is about.

If you ever watch the show, we're real brothas up there. We don't front. We don't have people tell us what kind of format we're going to do. You know. We keep it real, because that's how we live. You know what I'm sayin'?

And we tryin' to relay that to everyone else, so everyone can live a real life and be on the same vibe and have this campus phat. That's the thing about 307 and the future. We want to make this campus so phat that when people leave, they'll be like, "Yo, that UMass, that's a phat school to go to." Not just to party and everything, but just the whole vibe. Like when we have a concert, we don't want there to be like, 20 people cheering their hearts out to account for the 200 people that should've been there. That's why we promote everything. I want something to be phat. You know, 'cause that makes the school better. When the school's better, that makes more kids from our communities come here. And not just to party, but to be a part of the educational facilities that we have here. That'll bring attention to people. That's what ought ta try to do. We oughta try to promote our campus as being one of the better campuses for a black community or multicultural community.

BOOT CAMP CLIK
Student Union Ballroom
Oct. 31

As Halloween came through this past Thursday the Boot Camp Clik (B.C.C.) stormed the stages at the Student Union Ballroom in a University Productions and Concerts (U.P.C.) sponsored show.

Cocoa Brothas (formerly Smif-N-Wessun), Originoo Gunn Clappaz (O.G.C.) and Heltah Skeltah all represented the B.C.C.

Cocoa Brothas set it off performing songs including "Wrecognize," "Sound Boy Burial" and "Heads Ain't Ready."

O.G.C. followed with "No Fear" and other songs from their debut album Da Storm which was released last Tuesday.

Performing last from the B.C.C. family was Heltah Skeltah, whose set included a remix of "Therapy," "Da Wiggy" and "LeFleur LeFlah" to name just a few of the hits they performed off their latest album Nocturnal.

Unfortunately this crowd did not fill up the Student Union Ballroom which led the B.C.C. family to end the brief but powerful performance after an hour. This show was very reminiscent of the Black Moon and Smif-N-Wessun, both members of B.C.C.) show in the spring of '94 when the low audience turnout in a large auditorium once again affected the length of the show.

Steele, from Cocoa Brothas, ended the night with words of knowledge, speaking about taking the war to the streets and igniting the revolution.

Jordan soars high with Michael Collins

By Jeremy Brothers
Collegian Staff

MICHAEL COLLINS
Directed by Neil Jordan
with Liam Neeson, Aidan Quinn, Stephen Rea, Julia Roberts
Playing at Mt. Forms Four Theaters

Movies can't be confused with biographies, even those movies that can be called "films." If we can remember that, then we might just come to appreciate the little genre known as biopics for what they are, rather than what they aren't.

While they have the tendency to be the modern day equivalent of Cecil B. DeMille's cast-of-thousands Biblical epics, they aren't made about infallible characters like Moses or Samson.

Neil Jordan's Michael Collins is a fine example of the modern day epic. His character is not flawless: aside from being called the father of the Irish Republican Army (I.R.A.), he is also credited with bringing guerrilla warfare back into fashion. What is probably unknown is that while Collins' group was called the I.R.A., the group we now know is technically the Provisional I.R.A, created not in Collins' time, but in 1969.

Aside from that, there are problems that inherently come with making a movie about a famous person most Americans have never heard of. Michael Collins doesn't have the reassurance of that other British Isle epic, Braveheart. Justifications can be made: the action of Braveheart took place long ago, so people shouldn't have to remember the historical William Wallace, or even the struggle that took place. Nor do we have to: Braveheart is considered an epic because it summarizes both the Scottish struggle against the English and the life of William Wallace. However, the same can't be said for Michael Collins.

Jordan, who also wrote the screenplay, shows us neither the incarnation of the I.R.A. nor the lifespan of Michael Collins. What he does choose to show us is an exciting period of Collins' life when the army was small and fighting the British paramilitary Black and Tans. These sequences are fast-paced and thrilling, even if we don't exactly know what is going on. For those who know little of this century's struggles in Ireland, the film is entertaining, yet not satisfying enough to be considered "history."

As the famous Irish revolutionary, Liam Neeson is full of spitfire. He's at his best when tossing speeches off and inciting the crowds throughout Dublin. Neeson's enthusiasm and spirit carries through the entire film, benefiting it tremendously.

Aidan Quinn's Harry Boland delivers an admirable job, and by that it is meant that he can not only maintain what we assume is a proper Irish accent, but that he can walk and motion while using a proper Irish accent. Quinn plays the sidekick to Neeson's Collins and although this works while they're blowing people up, it becomes less interesting with the introduction of Miss Kitty Kiernan — when the Jules and Jim crap explodes.

Enter Julia Roberts, the actress that we like to remember as being in Pretty Woman rather than Hook. Someone, probably getting their 10 percent cut, told Roberts she could pull off a convincing brogue. Roberts plays "the girl" in every sense of the word: she sings, she dances, she doesn't seem to notice that the two men fighting for her affections are leading the war against the British, or that there's a war at all.

In supporting roles, both Alan Rickman and Stephen Rea are enjoyable. Rickman's morose monotone contrasts with Neeson's passion, enough to draw the line between Eamon De Valera, the official leader of the revolution, and Collins, who we assume is the spirit of the revolution. As Broy, Rea's double-agent is a delightfully sly character and a wonderful addition, (although there was a man named Broy, Rea's character is really an amalgamation of several real life characters) to the film. Funk, soul, jazz mix for Luscious show

By Sandi Okun
Collegian Correspondent

By extravagantly combining soul, funk, jazz and hip-hop, Luscious Jackson has become well known for their fabulous live show which they will bring to Pearl Street tonight.

Three out of the four members of the band grew up on the streets of New York City in the early '80s, hanging out with the "second wave of punks." Because of this unique setting their music was influenced then by punk legends like the Slits, as well as old-school rappers.

After playing in their friend's basement studio, they recorded their first album, In Search of Manny, which was released on the Beastie Boys' label, Grand Royal.

The band's connections to the Beastie Boys and the underground community run deep. Kate Schellenbach, former drummer of Beastie Boys, provides powerful percussions behind Luscious Jackson's dynamic sound. Members Gabby Glaser and Jill Cunniff, while living in San Francisco formed the punk band, Jaws.

Together the past craziness and individuality of these four women created Luscious Jackson.

Luscious Jackson's second album, Natural Ingredients, was a great musical explosion. The entirety of the album is devoted to the greatness of their home, New York City. They sing about what city life is like; not the crime, but the actual spirit within the city. Like storytelling the album takes the listener to places of their childhood and old memories.

Their smooth combination of jazz, soul and funk on this album enable you to kick back and enjoy the ride.

Luscious Jackson's songs are full of endless poetic lyrics and continuous samples. They also intertwine unique beats and rhythms that sets them apart from your average band.

These four powerful women have definitely made their mark in the music industry and should make an equally impressive mark on Northampton tonight as they support their new album on Grand Royal.

Labelmates, the Josephine Wiggs Experience, featuring members of the Breeders and Spiritualized will open the show.

Luscious Jackson and the Josephine Wiggs Experience perform at Pearl St. tonight in Northampton at 8 p.m. Call the club at 584-7774 for more information.

Sweeter than 'Caramel,' Vega shines

By Lisa M. Oliveri

SUZANNE VEGA
Academy of Music
Oct. 30

NORTHAMPTON — Dressed in a matronly black dress and a chic black overcoat, Suzanne Vega appeared demure and shy on stage. After just a few songs however, Vega gained more self-confidence and quickly wrapped the crowd around her finger.

"Do you know where passions end and friendships begin," Vega sang to a responsive, but often quiet crowd at the Academy of Music Wednesday night. Her performance was reminiscent of Mare Winningham's character in Georgia — confident, yet reserved.

After a lovely rendition of "Rock in this Pocket," Vega told the story of "Caramel," her song from The Truth About Cats and Dogs. She asked the audience to envision the scene where Uma Thurman eats cake, enticing the crowd into a sultry mood. Vega grew up in a multi-international home, and this influence rings true in her voice and music. Spanish calypso rhythms, like in "Caramel," echo in many of her songs.

Quite often great songwriters are effective storytellers and Vega captured the audience's attention with a narrative about how fans always ask her the meanings of her songs. She then reminisced about her days singing at the Iron Horse, and spoke of other personal experiences.

In the past decade, Vega has released five albums, and all of them are unique and individual. While she was decidedly folk on her debut, her songs are heavier on her later albums, and downright sultry on her latest. But her entire set flowed wonderfully, her stage presence coupled with her talent made the show seem like one long song.

Though she has much material to choose from, Vega played all the crowd's favorites including "Marlene on the Wall," "In Liverpool" and "Luka." After a thunderous applause, she returned to the stage to perform her hit, "Uncle Tom's Diner," letting the audience sing the chorus and once again, interjecting personal narratives, "Some people think that's a song about breakfast. It's a song about being alienated... while eating breakfast."

The show's only flaw was the band's loudness. Vega has a soft voice, and on the heavier songs, the band overshadowed her, making her almost inaudible. Vega's performing strength lies in her acoustic ballads, such as "Small Blue Thing."

Vega performed to a packed audience, and no one was left disappointed — as she received a standing ovation at the end of her show. She bowed slightly and quietly said "thank you," concluding an enjoyable evening.

Volleyball wins two on road

By Jeremy Adams
Collegian Staff

This weekend the Massachusetts volleyball team took advantage of a weak schedule by dumping on the Atlantic 10 doormats of late. The continuation of their road trip brought the Minutewomen to Olean, N.Y., on Friday to play the hapless Bonnies of St. Bonaventure, and to Pittsburgh, Pa., on Saturday to meet the slightly more promising Dukes of Duquesne.

MASSACHUSETTS 3
ST. BONAVENTURE 1

The wins improved the Minutewomen's record to 20–7 overall, and 9–4 in the conference. This is the third straight season they have reached the 20–win mark. They have now won four straight games in A-10 play, and are going into the tougher half of their conference schedule.

Unlike the previous meeting between the two teams, St. Bonaventure did not drop to a prone position and get completely trounced by Massachusetts. Instead, the Bonnies came out hard, winning the first game of the match by a rather convincing 15–6 score. They played tough throughout the match, while the Minutewomen cranked up the intensity through the second and third games. Those games both ended in 15–13 Massachusetts wins.

DUQUESNE 0

The tables finally reached the full turn in the fourth game, as the visitors officially reached peak performance, putting a convincing 15–3 exclamation point on the match.

The loss drops St. Bonaventure to 4–20 overall and 1–12 in the A–10. It was the third time this season that the Minutewomen played the Bonnies, and marked the completion of a sweep over the conference cellar dwellers.

Against St. Bonaventure, Dionne Nash recorded 20 kills and 10 digs. It was the seventh time this season that the senior met or eclipsed the score mark in kills. Freshman Jill Meyers also had a big night, adding 13 kills.

Duquesne's success has been more plentiful than St. Bonaventure's this season, but against Massachusetts they have fared just as poorly. The Lady Dukes dropped a three game decision to the Minutewomen on Saturday night, depreciating their record to 14–11, and 5–9 in the A–10.

Once again Massachusetts took the first couple games to get warmed up. This time UMass managed to do it without losing a game, but did not exactly dominate until the third game. Duquesne kept it close at first, losing 15–10 and 16– 14. In the third game Massachusetts was a model of merciless efficiency, dropping the Lady Dukes hard, 15–2.

Meyers led the way with a match-high 15 kills, and the ever-consistent Nash chipped in a respectable nine kills and 15 digs. Freshman Kari Hogancamp contributed six kills and nine digs, performing solidly all weekend, having added eight kills and seven digs against St. Bonaventure on the previous night.

UMass would show its resiliency once again after Dan LaCouture poked in a rebound at the 17:17 mark of the period, just 12 seconds later, Rob Bonneau, the team's goalscorer, did his job for the evening, hammering a 40–foot slap shot past Tom Noble in the BU net, off of assists from Warren Norris and Nathan Sell.

Hopes were high entering the third period tied at two, but the Terriers took things into sixth gear, scoring twice in the period's opening eight minutes, the second a perfect give-and–go between Drury and Mike Sylvia, where the sharp– shooted Drury found a gap between Moriarty and the left post that seemingly didn't exist.

Feeding off of a fervent crowd, the Minutemen closed the gap to 4–3 at the 13:56 mark, with Dan Juden tipping in a Dean Strok power play slapper from the blue line.

A strong sign of UMass' improvement, both overall and relative to the league frontrunners, was the team's 2–for–3 power play performance Saturday, while holding potent BU to an 0–for–3 mark.

The game nearly would have been tied at this point as a redirection by Bonneau hit the post with seven minutes to play. The goal light, along with the Gary Glitter and spotlight celebration, was triggered, but no goal was awarded.

BU added a pair of goals, in the final two minutes, including an empty–netter to hang on for the 6–3 decision sparing a likely tongue–lashing from temperamental coach Jack Parker before arriving back in Boston.

BU was a much happier team on Friday night, as they downed the Minutemen on their home ice. Drury scored the first two goals of a first period natural hat trick in the first 10 minutes, putting BU up 2–0.

UMass got its first goal at 11:45, Bonneau deflecting in a long slapper from Juden. Twenty–three seconds later UMass thought the game was tied, but an apparent goal was disallowed after the officials ruled that the puck had been kicked into the net.

BU poured in a pair of goals before the end of the first, skating into the dressing room up 4–1.

In the second period, the UMass team that nearly upended BU Saturday night showed up for an evenly played frame. Dennis Wright scored for UMass on a low and hard slapper, and Heron came from the weak side for a BU power play goal.

BU added a pair in the third for a 7–2 final.

to hurry.

The result showed it.

"You name it, we had problems, we just had no consistency," Hodges said. "Bottom line is we have to execute and move the football and we didn't do that."

Junior quarterback Anthony Catterton replaced freshman QB Jeff Smith at the start of the second half and went 6 for 18 for 87 yards but overall UMass only threw for 116 yards and Smith and Catterton were sacked a combined five times.

UMass fullback Ron Brockington was the leader on the ground with 84 yards, as sophomore wide receiver Doug Clark, the team's leading receiver, caught three balls for 71 yards including a couple key receptions late that kept the UMass drives alive.

The Minutemen are still alive for the divisional crown of the Yankee Conference, but will need to finish off the year with two wins and will once again need a little help from other teams.

"What we have to try to do is find a way to try to win these last two for our seniors, and that's exactly what we're going to try to do," Hodges said.

ing been in the University infirmary for two days with a virus. Although she did not start, UMass coach Pam Hixon sent Johnston in as a substitute and was pleased with her play.

"I said, 'Do you think you can go?' and she looked like she had a good warm-up and she appeared to have energy," Hixon said.

Rothenberger padded the Minutewomen's lead, when she scored an insurance goal in the second half. On a designed play Hixon had called earlier, Rothenberger took advantage of Fedesco's size (she stands at only 5–foot–4) by lifting the ball over the St. Joe's net–minder.

A Hawk post player then caught the ball, and dropped before the play was ruled a goal.

"I've tried [the shot] in games before and a lot of times I get it called dangerous or else the goalie stops it and clears it out, but it finally worked, and what a day for it to work for me," Rothenberger said. "I didn't really realize what had happened. When I saw her catch it I was kind of thrown off, I didn't even know what the rule was on that, because I know in ice hockey you can catch it and throw it down.

"I saw Saskia get the rebound and hit it in so I didn't really think anything of it. There was a whole lot of confusion," said Rothenberger.

Hixon too, was unsure of what had happened.

"It was a designed play that Kyle was going to lift it over, because the goalkeeper came out and she's relatively small, and Kyle has a very good lift," Hixon said. "Kyle made a great play on the ball and their post player was actually behind the goalie. She must have caught it, because of the way the umpire called the goal right away, she must have caught it inside the cage, otherwise it would have been a penalty stroke."

Massachusetts had several other chances in the tilt, but couldn't convert. In the final seconds of the first half, the Minutewomen put together a drive that took them deep inside the Hawk circle. Laura Phelan, who made the move to midfield from her position as a back, was poised to attack Fedesco, but the clock wasn't working to her favor, as the half ended before she could get a shot off.

In the second half, Johnston was nearly involved on another goal. She crossed the ball in front of the St. Joe's goal–mouth, where a diving Katherine McClellan came up just short of a third UMass goal.

Phelan and Fuchs both continued the attack, as Phelan cranked out a shot from the top of the circle and Fuchs unloaded from just inside. Fedesco got a piece of both shots to stave off further Minutewoman tallies.

"I thought we created some great opportunities," Hixon said.

The UMass defense was stellar on the afternoon, keeping the ball away from the Minutewomen net. Goalie Hilary Rose, who has been dealing with a slight knee strain, needed to make only four saves to record her sixth shutout of the season. Fedesco stopped 13 shots for the Hawks.

Although the seniors were honored before Saturday's game, the Minutewomen still have one contest remaining. They will face off against Yale today at 2 p.m. in a rescheduled game. That game, originally scheduled for Sept. 18, was rained out.

The freshman from Aurora, Colo., has been a starter since that fateful day on Oct. 4th at La Salle when Myers went down for the season, and her career. In the 31st minute against George Mason, Tokarchik did what her eminent predecessor did 38 times in her career, and picked up a rebound from a shot by senior Julie Magid to put UMass ahead at 1–0.

Another freshman, forward Emma Kurowski, booted her 10th goal of the season at the 72:54 mark to make it 2–0, converting a cross from senior defender Erin Lynch (12 assists on the season), with an assist to Tokarchik.

Coach Jim Rudy had to be thinking about the roller coaster ride his team has been on since Oct. 4th, and a win over No. 15 George Mason was just what the team was looking for; especially considering their lack of a strong schedule due to conference obligations.

"I am very happy with the way our team played today," Rudy said. "We played our game and went out there and picked up a win we really needed.

"We are excited to be playing against this level of competition here at this tournament. This is a great facility and I think the team took full advantage of that today."

Before a tilt match crowd of 700 on Sunday afternoon, the Minutewomen matched up against the hometown Aggies in an attempt to pull off the upset. A win over A&M on the road would have almost locked up a NCAA berth for UMass, but that will now be left up to the Tournament committee as the Minutewomen dropped a tough 3–0 loss.

The Aggies took control of the contest early, as blazing Bryn Blalack scored the eventual game–winner at the 15:26 mark on a cross from Kristen Koop and Yvette Older. A&M played the best 20 minutes Rudy said he has ever seen in the first half, and finished off the scoring with Koop converting a corner to make the score 2–0 at intermission. It was a game of inches for UMass, as Lynch and senior Amy Powell had scoring chances just get away from them, Julie Pinkerton rounded out the scoring with a goal in the last minute.

Minutewomen Notes: The trio of Lynch, Erica Iverson and Kurowski were named to the All–Tournament team this past weekend, as Lynch had an assist and Kurowski had a goal in Friday's win over George Mason... George Washington (6–0–2 A–10), through no fault of their own, lost the West Division this weekend. Dayton (7–0–1 A–10) beat La Salle and Xavier this past week to leap frog over the Colonials. So, now GW will play UMass this Friday night at 8:30 p.m., instead of their intended matchup in Sunday's final. Dayton will play Fordham in the other Friday game, as the Rams took second place in the East.

■ men's soccer

out of their hands. The only way to make it would be the basis of another team's short comings. That team was Fordham.

UMass' last chance at the postseason rested on the shoulders of Fordham, Fordham boasted 19 points on a record of 7–4–0 in the A–10. The Minutemen stood at 21 points and a record of 7–4–0. With three points awarded for a win, one point for a tie, Fordham's 2–1 win over Temple gave the Rams a one point edge over UMass and the final tournament spot.

■ Moriarty

It was a tricky situation for Moriarty on Friday night, as in the biggest game for UMass in the early season, Regan did not do the job. After freshman Chris Heron's power play goal at the 3:41 mark of the second to make the score 5–1, Mallen pulled his presenson No. 1 in favor of Moriarty.

It could have been a case from going from the frying pan into the fire, but the substitution worked for UMass, and both the team and Moriarty picked their game up. Making every save possible, he did his utmost to keep UMass in the game. But in the end, the goal deficit was too wide, and BU ran off to an eventual 7–2 defeat.

On Saturday night, Moriarty's start raised eyebrows around the Mullins Center, and so did a 0-0 deadlock after the first period. There was not too much to talk about, and Moriarty made the saves he had to make (7 saves, 24 on the night). The pace of the game picked up in the second period, with the Minutemen and the Terriers exchanging goals to make it 2–2.

Moriarty was surprised when he heard he would get the start.

"Let's face it, Brian Regan's our guy here. He is a great goaltender, he is a great player and he is a great friend," he said. "And unfortunately, I got the nod tonight. I think there is no doubt that Brian Regan is the guy here, and he has proved that since he first came here."

But a fluke goal bit the Minutemen at 4:10 of the third period. After a deflection off of a BU defenseman that went by Noble and hit the post, the same happened to UMass a few minutes later, but with a negative outcome. BU rode the fluke, and came out with the tough 6–3 win.

Mallen knew that his choice might backfire, but it did not, and Moriarty came through for him.

"He put us in a position to win by making all those saves early in the game," Mallen said. "It was good for our team. Brian Regan has been our goaltender, and he probably will remain our top goaltender. But this kid's worked hard, and he came in great shape this year, and he deserved a chance."

HOROSCOPES

ARIES
March 21-April 20
A commitment you've been putting off could be at a critical phase, so every move you make is significant. Be very sure of what you really want before firing off one of your infamous flip replies. This week, it's better to invest than to indulge.

TAURUS
April 21-May 21
A productive streak could have people close to you in awe. Turn it to their advantage by subtly helping them out, and you'll win over someone who didn't care for you previously.

GEMINI
May 22-June 21
If the boundaries of your world seem to be closing in on you, stand back and take a deep breath. This is not the time to let yourself go crazy. A domestic project could evolve into a romantic interlude.

CANCER
June 22-July 22
Keep abreast of the latest facts for a real advantage in an unexpected confrontation. You'll win the respect of someone who knows the value of doing their homework. Enjoy an uneventful evening—it could be your ticket to a good cuddle.

LEO
July 23-August 23
Your sense of humor is infectious and a great asset in an ongoing negotiation. Enlist the help of an expert to troubleshoot your latest brainstorm or project. You'll save time, money and embarrassment over the long run.

VIRGO
August 24-September 22
Business is booming—are you ready for it? Go with the flow to reap the most benefits from this situation. You could be called upon to perform an unusual task. You're equal to it, or they wouldn't have asked.

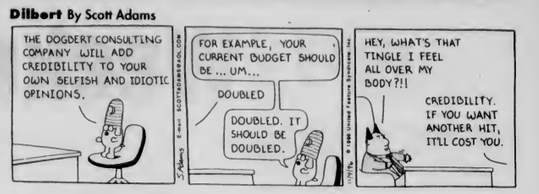
LIBRA
September 23-October 23
Treat yourself to a lazy weekend—an extra-long shower or bath or a gourmet breakfast would be a great start. Share your time with someone who's in need of some extra TLC and companionship. You'll both feel better.

SCORPIO
October 24-November 22
A good partner makes it easy to glide through some tough circumstances. Be sure you're communicating your appreciation. They may feel that you take them for granted. Look for a new solution to an old problem.

SAGITTARIUS
November 23-December 21
A cluttered environment could be the symptom of a deeper problem. Call in an organized friend for their input into your behavior. You could be startled by how well you can clean up your act.

CAPRICORN
December 22-January 20
If stress has you feeling burned out, spend time with an easygoing person. They could really refresh you and give you renewed energy. Music and books hold special appeal, too. Check out the library.

AQUARIUS
January 21-February 18
Build security down the line by making a small sacrifice this week. It's possible to have some cake and eat it too—it's just a matter of proportion. Your patience and grace under fire earn you extra brownie points.



PISCES
February 19-March 20
A friendly gathering offers the chance to network. Your sincerity—or insincerity—will be clearly apparent. Don't try to overwhelm people. They will appreciate you on your own terms, or not at all.

UM clinches Atlantic 10 Terriers topple Minutemen

Field hockey earns regular season title on Senior Day

By Casey Kane

After honoring seniors Hilary Rose, Melanie Gore and Kyle Rothenberger before the crowd of fans at Totman Field, the Massachusetts field hockey team beat St. Joseph's 2–0 to cap off the afternoon's celebrations.

ST. JOSEPH'S	1

THANG VO / COLLEGIAN

Senior Kyle Rothenberger scored a goal in UMass' 2–0 blanking of St. Joe's, helping UMass finish No. 1 in the A– 10s.

The victory gave No. 8 UMass (13–5, 5–0 Atlantic 10) the regular season A–10 title, which it last won in 1994, and the top draw in next weekend's conference tournament. The loss dropped the Hawks to 7–11, 2–2 in A–10 play.

The Minutewomen made a perfect run through the A–10 season, and now prepare for the upcoming tournament, to be held next weekend in Philadelphia. La Salle is guaranteed a spot in the tourney, while Temple, Rhode Island and St. Joseph's are all still fighting for a berth.

For the first time, the winner of the Atlantic 10 tournament will automatically play in an NCAA Tournament play–in game. That game will pit the A–10 champion against the winner of the Mid–America conference on Nov. 12.

UMass got on the board in the first half of Saturday's contest, when Erica Johnston staked the Minutewomen to a 1–0 advantage with 14:01 remaining in the half. Kerry Lyons sent a shot on Hawks' goalie Joan Fedesco, and the ball trickled through her legs. Johnston picked up the ball and sent it to the back of the St. Joe's cage.

"It's about time, I've been in a slump for the last couple of weeks," Johnston said. "It was a good combination from Saskia [Fuchs] and Kerry [to set up the goal]."

Johnston was unsure of whether she would play before the game, having practiced only sparingly in the past few weeks due to a hamstring injury.

UMass faces early season battle, Moriarty key in battle with BU

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

The last thing a Massachusetts hockey fan would have expected to see was junior Brian Regan not between the pipes for the Minutemen (1–3, 1–3 in Hockey East) last Saturday night. This home and home series with No. 4 Boston University (3–1, 2–0 HE) was an important test for UMass, and both the casual observer and the hardcore fan could easily assume that Regan would be the one to face the Terrier onslaught.

But at a pre–game meeting on Saturday morning, coach Joe Mallen let senior goaltender Rich Moriarty know that he was going to be the starter.

The move came as somewhat of a surprise since Regan would seem like the automatic choice since being a All–Hockey East Rookie team member, and a starter in almost half of the Minutemen's games in their first three seasons (44 out of 100).

But after a sub–par showing in a 7–2 loss at Walter Brown Arena on Friday night, where Regan only made four saves on nine shots, the senior vet was called on to stop the vulcanized rubber from hitting the nylon netting. And when you look a little closer at Moriarty, it is not a surprise. The senior from Wilbraham has been here at UMass since the reinstatement of the hockey program, and has done the job when called upon.

Moriarty was the starter for UMass' first victory against a Div. 1 opponent since their reinstatement, when they beat Army 4–3 on Jan. 29, 1994.

His first start of the season and first since a Jan. 19 game at Boston College. Moriarty was agile in goal, making several saves with sharp reflexes.

The game was scoreless for the first 25:45 as BU tried to adjust to a rapidly changing UMass forechecking scheme, which had the Terriers crossed–up and committing far more neutral zone turnovers than usual throughout the contest.

Coach Joe Mallen's team randomly switched between a standard 1–2–2 neutral zone defense, an aggressive three–man forecheck, and an ultra–passive three defenseman setup. The Minuteman forecheckers threw everything short of the kitchen sink at BU's defense on Terrier break–outs.

Finally, BU's Chris Heron broke through to open the scoring, but UMass showed its resiliency, striking back just over a minute later.

UMass' Chris Fawcett capitalized on the first of two ill– timed Chris Drury penalties, converting on a centering pass from Steve MacKinnon from behind the net, to even the score.

The Massachusetts hockey team (1–3, 1–3 in Hockey East) played its collective heart out, but fell to No. 4 Boston University (3–1, 2–0) 6–3 Saturday night at the William D. Mullins Center, in a nail–biter that was far closer than the final score indicates.

BOSTON U.	7

After 40 minutes of play, the teams were deadlocked at two goals apiece, and each had chances take command, as UMass fans dreamt of the upset.

Participants in each of the last six final fours, the Terriers routinely terrorize the Minutemen, including Friday's 7–2 blitzing at the Walter Brown Arena. This year's edition of the Minutemen, and many of their fans, genuinely felt that they had a chance of winning one of this weekend's two games, provided they play like they did Saturday night.

BOSTON U.	6

But, in the third period, while UMass still scrapped, clawed and played the same inspired hockey that it had all evening, BU simply turned it up a notch. Hockey East's laberwock reared its ugly head, and silenced the rowdy Mullins crowd that was so close to being in Wonderland.

The Minutemen were strong with Rich Moriarty starting in net, making

Minutemen mauled by Bears, 22–14

By Mike Corey
Collegian Staff

On Saturday afternoon, the Massachusetts Football team was dealt a 22–14 loss at the hands of the Maine Black Bears, and with it goes down the Minutemen's chances of obtaining their first Yankee Conference title since 1990.

On a cold and windy afternoon at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni stadium, Maine took advantage of a stagnant and penalty ridden performance by UMass to come out on top, in a very sloppy contest in where neither team played an impressive football game.

MAINE	22

This was a game that was painful to watch no matter what team you were cheering for. The Minutemen were flagged 12 times for penalties totaling 100 yards, fumbled twice, losing one, and threw one interception.

With the win the Black Bears improve to 6–3, 5–3 in the Yankee Conference while the loss drops the Minutemen to 5–4 overall this season and 3–3 in the conference.

"I'm not at a loss of words very many times but this one was tough," UMass coach Mike Hodges said.

After the Minutemen opened the contest with an ugly series and were forced to punt, Maine took advantage of their first possession of the football, grabbing a touchdown in only 57 seconds. Senior tailback Bob Jameson capped off the four play, 53 yard drive with a 30 yard touchdown.

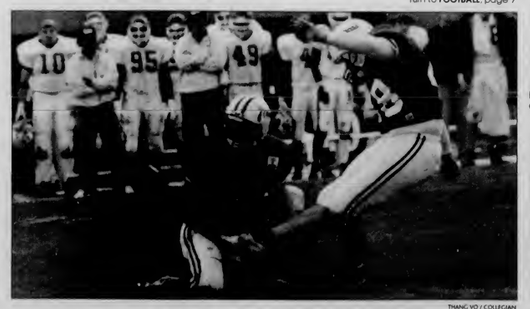
The Black Bears missed the extra point and at the start of the second quarter added a field goal to take an early 9–0 advantage. Two possession later, the Minutemen would drive into Maine territory but only to come up with a field goal try.

The kick was good, however a roughing the kicker penalty on the Black Bears gave the Minutemen an automatic first down at the Maine three yard line, where after two rushes suphomore Matt Jordan drove in for the TD from a yard out to cut the lead to 9–7, which is the way it stood at the half.

Beginning the second half of action, Maine added another field goal to make it a 12–7 lead. Then after four possessions from both schools which all but one went three downs and out, the Minutemen finally took over the lead on four straight runs by redshirt freshman Jamie Holston as he ran for a total of 35 yards, the last run for a 23 yard score for the 14–12 lead.

However, that would be the extent of the UMass scoring. The play of the game came early in the fourth quarter after the Black Bears had taken the 15–14 lead on another field goal. Kick returner Derrick Brown took a 46 yard punt by Andy Maclay at his own 37 yard line and ran it back 63 yards into paydirt for the Maine victory, 22–14.

"We've got to play ready to play, we not good enough to go out there and just go through the motions and beat anybody, never mind a good football team that we played this week," Hodges said.



UMass totaled 301 yards to Maine's 226, netting 185 yards on the ground while the Black Bears had 136 yards of their offense come through the air. The Minutemen had the football for seven minutes more, but could not capitalize on Maine mistakes.

The Minutemen had a few chances to tie the contest in the final period, threatening a few times into Maine territory, but could not convert. Their drives were stopped short and they were forced to punt.

A key drive of the game that UMass was unable to make good on came with 5:56 left in the fourth. The Minutemen had the ball at midfield with a fourth down and one to go. UMass came out of the power I formation (three running backs), and faked the run in trying to connect with tight end Kerry Taylor but the ball was knocked down.

With 3:37 left UMass would have their final possession of the game and got it down to the Maine 38 yard line before a Hail Mary pass was served up that did not have any receivers nearby to answer it. UMass had burned their time outs a little too prematurely and on the last possession had

UM splits trip to Lone Star State

It all came down to this weekend for the No. 20 Massachusetts women's soccer team, as an 18–game regular season was down to a two–game tournament. The Minutewomen travelled southwest to College Station, Texas, for the Post Oak Mall Soccer Classic. The Minutewomen (14–3–1, 7–0–1 in A–10) had to either win this tournament, or at least get to the title match, to be considered for postseason NCAA action.

UMass matched up with No. 15 George Mason on Friday afternoon, and if they won, would play the winner of the match between the host team of No. 6 Texas A&M and No. 9 UNC–Greensboro on Sunday.

From the home office at the Aggie Soccer Complex in College Station, Friday's phrase of the day was "expect the unexpected" as freshman midfielder Tarah Tokarchik scored her first collegiate goal to lead UMass to a 2–0 win.

On Sunday afternoon, though, UMass had the task before them of upsetting Texas A&M in the title match, as they beat UNC–Greensboro in the second game on Friday by a 2–0 score. The Aggies were too much for the Minutewomen, as they dropped a 3–0 score to their not–so–kind hosts.

TEXAS A&M	3
MASSACHUSETTS	0

The last player coming to mind to lead the Minutewomen to a victory would be Tokarchik, but that is not said in a negative manner. In a second half of the season where UMass has lost their all–time leading scorer in senior Rebecca Myers, and also dropped out of the top twenty for the first time in their senior's tenure, a little help from the newcomers came at the right moment.

URI loss dashes UMass' postseason hopes

By Chris Stamm
Collegian Staff

One penalty shot. That is all it took to dash the postseason hopes of the Massachusetts men's soccer team.

The Minutemen entered Saturday's match against Rhode Island on the road knowing that they were on the bubble. That bubble burst when the Minutemen, who began the season with high hopes and its first ever national ranking, failed to qualify for the Atlantic 10 Tournament losing to Rhode Island 1–0.

RHODE ISLAND	1
MASSACHUSETTS	0

Leading up to the weekend, UMass was tied for third place with Virginia Tech with 21 points each. While Rhode Island held down the No. 1 spot with 27 points, five points ahead of No. 2 La Salle, the Minutemen knew they could enter the tournament two ways.

The first way UMass could reach the A–10's the math was easy — beat the Rams and you're in. The second way was not as simple, a loss or tie would wrap up the Minutemen's fate with another squad's record.

The Rams, who sat atop the Atlantic 10 standings throughout the season, had already cinched a berth in the conference tournament with a record of 13–4–1 (9–1–0 A–10). While another win didn't mean much on paper to the Rams, a UMass win was the only surefire way the Minutemen could plan on spending the long weekend in Dayton, site of this year's tournament.

UMass knew what it was up against as they faced the Ram's in last season's A–10 Championship match, falling 5– 2.

In the 57th minute, Rhody's Andrew Williams notched the game's only goal, converting a penalty shot for the win.

In the net for the Minutemen, sophomore keeper Jeff Jablonski posted two stops on the day, while Rhode Island's Anthony Latronica earned four saves. Offensively, UMass was out–shot by the Rams 12–6.

While it wasn't impossible for Massachusetts to earn a bid into the conference tournament, the matter was

Future of communism voted on in Bulgaria

SOFIA, Bulgaria (AP) — People in the poorest corner of Europe, where communism was too entrenched to die easily, had a chance this weekend to say yes or no to the Communists' successors. Where they had a real choice, they threw 'em out.

Elections Sunday in Romania, Bulgaria and Yugoslavia, where some 40 million people reside, reinforced two points about politics in the post–Communist era:

•People here, like elsewhere, vote their pocketbooks. In Romania and Bulgaria, voters said plainly that their pocketbooks are empty and they're fed up.

•Disregard point No. 1 if the rulers dominate the media during campaigns, like Russia's Boris Yeltsin did this summer, or strong–arm voters, as did Albanian President Sali Berisha. On Sunday, Serbian President Slobodan Milosevic proved he was equally adept at using his advantage.

The wind of change that swept through the musty corridors of communist power in eastern and central Europe seven years ago this month ended as a feeble breeze in Romania and Bulgaria.

Kerry & Weld make final pitch to voters

MALDEN (AP) — In their final appeals before Tuesday's U.S. Senate election, Gov. William F. Weld asked voters to remember his tax cuts and Sen. John Kerry promised to fight for education and other social spending if re–elected.

Weld, trailing slightly in the polls, also urged undecided voters to trust their gut instinct.

"I know I do. I go into the voting booth and cast a reasonably gut vote," the governor said before visiting a senior citizens' center in this city.

Both candidates were wrapping up their 11–month campaign in style, Weld with a North End parade and Kerry with an old–fashioned political rally in Boston's West Roxbury section. Weld also aired a half–hour television infomercial highlighting his accomplishments as governor the past six years.

After scores of appearances, some $15 million in fund–raising and an unprecedented series of debates, Weld and Kerry finished their race much like they began. Between them yesterday they held campaign events from Beverly to Chicopee.

Weld, the Republican nominee, asked voters to look at his record on crime, welfare and taxes.

Massachusetts voters face tough choices

Question 1 challenges voters; calls for debatable reforms

By Daniel E. Levenson
Collegian Staff

Today, voters will decide whether or not to pass the controversial Question One, the Massachusetts Wildlife Protection Act.

The Commonwealth of Massachusetts Department of Fisheries, Wildlife and Environmental Law Enforcement provided the Collegian with their position statement on the proposal.

The act, they said, would alter the composition of the Fisheries and Wildlife Board and reform certain hunting and trapping regulations.

According to this statement, Question One would, "prohibit the use and possession of most types of traps, prohibit the training and use of dogs to hunt bear and bobcat, prohibit the use of bait or lure to hunt bear [which is already prohibited under Massachusetts law], and eliminate the requirement that the five regional appointees to the Fisheries and Wildlife Board have held a sporting license for five years."

It would effectively ban certain types of animal traps which have been deemed "cruel."

In addition to this stipulation, there are a number of other changes the act would implement, such as banning the of hunting bear with bait or dogs.

The Massachusetts Department of Fisheries, Wildlife and Environmental Law enforcement arm opposed to portion of the proposed act.

In fact, they said, "the use of bait to hunt bear has been prohibited by the Fisheries and Wildlife board since 1970."

The agency questions the inclusion of the proposal to ban a practice which is already illegal. They said that it represents a general misunderstanding of Massachusetts wildlife regulations and laws on the part of Question One supporters.

The Department states that many government agencies are against the act because it would interfere with the Division of Fisheries and Wildlife's ability to effectively regulate hunting, fishing and trapping.

The make–up of the Fisheries and Wildlife board is also an issue in the act. Critics maintain that in order for conservation programs to effectively benefit both humans and wildlife, it is a crucial requirement to have a certain number of board members hold a license issued by the department, such as one for hunting.

The seven–member board is composed of one professional biologist and one person who has "an interest in wildlife species that are not hunted." The other members each represent the five statewide Fish and Wildlife regions. Additionally, one of the members representing a district must also be involved with agriculture.

The Department of Fisheries and Wildlife, which is funded by sporting licenses and fees, as opposed to general tax dollars, says that the district representatives are required to have held a license in order to "assure that the fee–paying public has oversight of the expenditure of its money."

Another reason that the board is composed of license holding individuals is to insure that the "board has some understanding of management issues with respect to regulating hunting, fishing and trapping seasons to regulate wildlife populations."

According to Douglas Macron, a member of the University of Massachusetts Animal Rights Coalition (ARC), Question One is a question of humanity — his group supports the measure.

"The official opinion is that we support Question One," said Macron. "Definitely the opinion of the ARC is full support."

While the group does not oppose hunting and fishing, they do feel that the legislation to ban certain types of "cruel" traps should be passed.

In a recent statement from the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals and the American Humane Education Society, Kara Holmquist, associate director of advocacy said, "body–gripping traps, such as the leghold trap, are indiscriminate and often catch non–target species. Family pets have been caught in these traps."

The group also said in the same statement that, "under Question One, prohibited traps can be used if public health or safety is threatened or if property damage occurs and cannot be remedied with a humane box or cage trap."

Joseph S. Carson, a director of the Massachusetts Aduobon Society and a professor of Wildlife Ecology and director of the Environmental Institute UMass, opposes Question One.

He said in a statement, "I strongly oppose this question because it is not in the best interests of the wildlife it protects. Neither is it in the interest of the citizens of the commonwealth. Should this initiative become law, it will hinder scientific wildlife research and wise use management practices throughout the state. The result will be increased wildlife damage to property and confrontations between wildlife and people."

Carson also addresses the fact that "prohibition of steel leghold traps is meaningless because such traps are essentially banned under current Massachusetts law."

He gives the example of the town of Chelmsford, where in 1988, a ban on trapping led to an explosion on the beaver population, resulting in damage to public and private property. After the ban was removed, the problem, he said was solved.

According to Carson, "Question One would replace a scientifically based wildlife management system with an ideology based on misinformation and emotion. However well–intentioned, such legislation is a recipe for calamity for wildlife and humans."

According to a recent Time magazine article, hunting reform legislation is appearing on ballots in six states across the country. In Addition to Massachusetts, Colorado voters will also consider banning what many are calling unnecessarily cruel traps.

Majors fair offers UMass' best

Undecided students urged to attend tomorrow night in S.U.B.

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

Over 60 majors will be represented at the University of Massachusetts Majors Fair in the Student Union Ballroom tomorrow night from 6 p.m. to 7:30 p.m.

The fair, which is sponsored by the University Advising Center, the Honors Program and the Career Center, will allow undeclared students to obtain information on prospective majors as well as facts about the Honors Program, the Career Center and other academic resources.

Elaine Parmett, chief academic advisor at the University Advising Center said, "the whole gamut will be represented. Information for undecided students, pre–majors, honors students, and those needing academic counseling will be available at the fair."

According to Parmett, all 10 of UMass' schools and colleges will be represented at the fair.

"It's going to be bigger and better than ever," said Linda Roney, coordinator for the University Advising Center.

For the first time, the Honors Program will attend the fair because "we feel there is a lot of overlapping between programs for majors and the Honors Program," said Roney.

Although the majors fair focuses on the needs of undeclared students, all students are urged to attend.

"The fair offers so much information about so many programs and majors that most students do not even know exist here at UMass," said Parmett.

Parmett also urged students who are questioning if they choose the right major, need a minor or just information about concerning requirements to attend.

"It is a time for students to explore and clarify their field of study especially for pre–majors. If a student is thinking about double majoring, this is a great place to start," she said.

All undergraduate chief advisors have been invited to attend the majors fair as well as students to assist in peer advising.

"Students will have the opportunity to ask their peers questions about what it is like to be in that particular major. Peer advising allows students to get a student perspective about the major and not just a professor perspective," said Roney.

Roney said that if students take full advantage of the fair it can be "a one stop shop."

In addition to the majors, many support and resource groups will be available for questions. Counseling and Academic Development, University Advising Center, the Career Center and many other academic resources will attend the fair.

Students don't need to stay for the entire event. If the fair conflicts with another commitment, students are encouraged to drop by for as much time as possible.

"Students really only need to attend for the amount of time it takes to get their questions answered," said Roney.

Parmett said that students who attend the majors fair will have an opportunity to "check out the best that UMass has to offer."

Desalvo to dictate memoirs

By Michelle Hillman
Collegian Staff

Louise Desalvo, an acclaimed critic, biographer, and novelist will speak tomorrow at the Five College Women's Studies Research Center, Mount Holyoke College, at 7:30 p.m. Desalvo will read from her new book entitled, Vertigo: A Memoir.

Desalvo is a Virginia Woolf scholar and Professor at Hunter College who seven years ago broke uncharted ground when she stunned the literary world by delving into the mystery that surrounded Woolf's "madness," by reinterpreting her work and paralleling it to the sexual abuse she suffered as a child.

Daring to venture into territory other biographers had veered away from, Desalvo changed forever the way childhood is viewed in in literary biography, as Kennedy Fraser wrote in The New Yorker, she made a real "contribution to the literature of women's lives truthfully described by women."

With the completion of Desalvo's own painful memories, Desalvo sifts through unspoken truths and unresolved conflicts the heart of her family life. Devastated by the suicide of her sister, hoping to come to terms with the grief and guilt and terror evoked by that desperate act and continuing breakdown of her mother, Delsalvo has compacted her voyage to self–discovery in Vertigo.

The title of her new book was derived from Alfred Hitchcock's Vertigo, a film which Desalvo was obsessed with since the age of 15. Hitchcock's film enveloped all the confusing and contradictory messages she received as a young woman.

Vertigo, written with sheer honesty is a work that is a challenging example of a woman writing her life in a manner that defies convention and refuses to suppress the truth of female experience.

Delsalvo is a Professor of English at Hunter College, where she teaches memoir and fiction writing. She has written and edited nine books, among them, the accaimed Virginia Woolf: The Impact of Childhood Sexual Abuse on Her Life and Work. Conceived with Malice: Literature as Revenge, and Vita Sackville–West's Letters to Virgia Woolf.

This event is co–sponsored with the Odyssey Bookshop at the Village Commons in South Hadley.

Workers World Party: triple the minimum wage

By Joseph Fountain
Collegian Staff

For the first time in any residential campaigns, two women of color are running together as a ticket for President and Vice President.

Monica Moorhead and Gloria La Riva are members of the Workers World Party (WWP) and on 15 state ballots, including Massachusetts.

"It is a historic opportunity to cast a vote for the first presidential ticket composed of two women of color," said Nick Cammerota. Western Massachusetts spokesperson for the Moorhead/La Riva campaign.

The WWP has in the past three months gained much notoriety for crashing the third–party debate televised on C– SPAN, an event the party was not invited to.

At the debate, Moorhead took the stage for 12 minutes before security escorted her out of the premises. She asked those present why the only African–American on the ballot for President was not invited to the debate.

In August, Moorhead confronted Clinton at his birthday bash in New York.

At this event, she said she was able to do something that Dole has not been able to do since the campaign began — get under Clinton's collar.

Covered by all the three major networks, Clinton found himself involved in a tit–for–tat debate with Moorhead on such issues as Cuba, Iraq and the Plight of the poor in America.

According to the campaign, Moorhead has called for an "independent people's investigation" into the Central Intelligence Agency's possible links to drug running in predominantly African–American communities.

"She has called for the dismantling of the CIA," said Camerota.

"Despite years of denial by the White House, Congress and intelligence agencies, solid proof has surfaced that ties the CIA to the flood of crack and other deadly drugs into the African–American community in Los Angeles and other cities," said Moorhead.

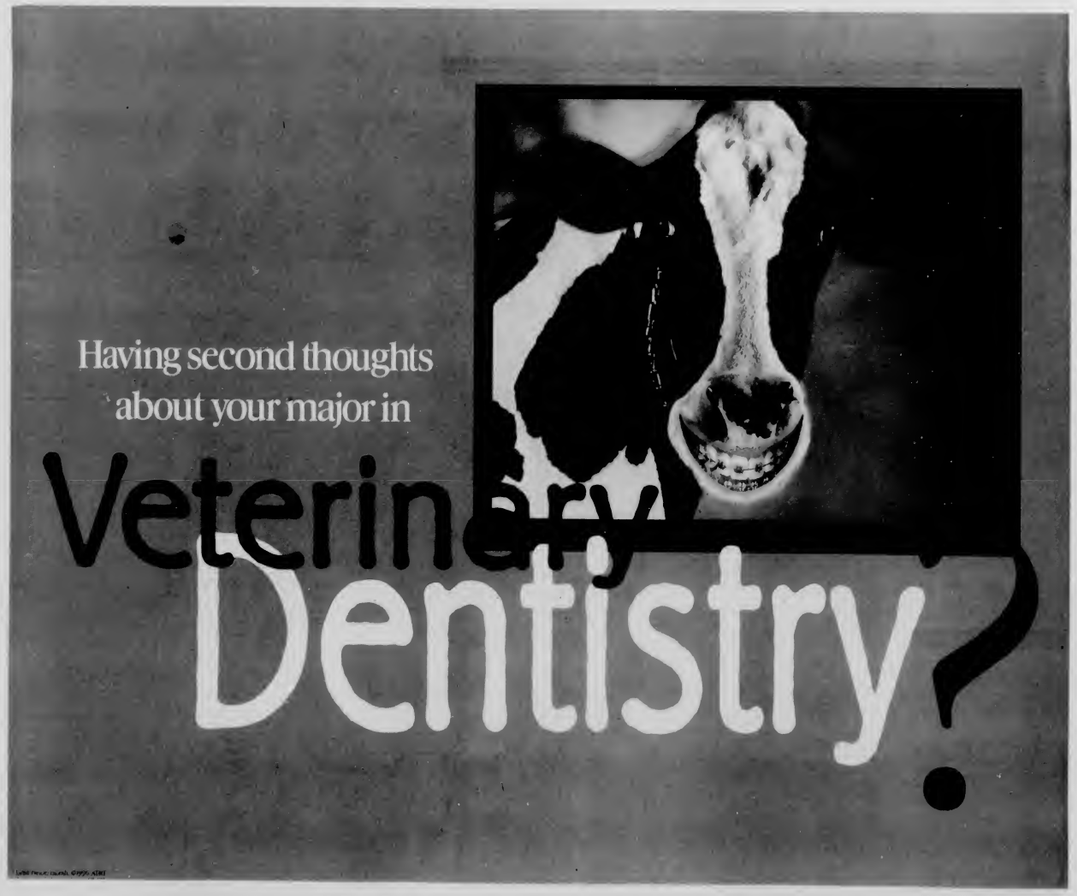
Moorhead was the granddaughter of slaves and was born in Tuscaloosa, Ala. in 1952. Her political life began while in high school working to support the Black Panther Party.

Moorhead joined the WWP in 1973 and organized support for JoAnn Little, an imprisoned African–American woman who killed guard he allegedly raped her.

During Moorhaed's career with WWP, she has helped organize unions, protests and has been a writer for the WWP newspaper. She has also been a WWP representative to several countries including Nicaragua, Cuba and the Dominican Republic.



She was also the head of U.S. Out of South Africa, a group set up to get U.S. corporations out of South Africa during the apartheid years.

The Vice Presidential candidate, Gloria La Riva was born in Albuquerque, N.M. She has worked on issues such as lifting the U.S. embargo on Cuba and was a member of the delegation that visited the Zapatista rebels in Chiapas, Mexico as an international observer.

La Riva ran for Vice President in 1984 and 1988 and then for Governor of California in 1994.

WWP was founded 35 years ago and has been at the "forefront of workers rights and the oppressed peoples of the world," according to the party. Some of the other issues for the WWP include:

"Tripling the minimum wage to $12.75, ending all union busting and strike ending activities by corporations; affirmative action to end all forms of discrimination; cancelling the debt to banks; freedom of choice for women and complete and equal rights for gays lesbians and transgendered people," according to official party statements.

Yeltsin undergoes heart bypass surgery; transfers over power

By Candice Hughes
Associated Press

MOSCOW — President Boris Yeltsin underwent heart surgery early today after transferring his powers to the prime minister, the Kremlin said.

A Kremlin spokesman said only that the operation had begun at the Moscow Cardiological Center in western Moscow, but gave no other details.

Russian news agencies reported that Yeltsin earlier transferred his powers to Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin, including control over Russia's huge nuclear arsenal.

The Kremlin announcement came after a convoy of vehicles swept out of the government rest center where Yeltsin had been preparing for the operation and traveled to the heart center.

The Kremlin had announced the operation would go ahead after doctors said yesterday that Yeltsin was ready for the surgery. Uncertainty about Yeltsin's health and a virtual government freeze on information has created widespread speculation that the president was too ill for the operation. The uncertainty has given an impression the government has lacked leadership with Yeltsin's aides and rivals squabbling for power.

Doctors said yesterday that Yeltsin was fit enough for the bypass surgery and that the long-awaited operation would take place in the next few days. The brief statement was issued after Yeltsin's medical team met with American heart surgery pioneer, Dr. Michael DeBakey, who is a consultant on the case.

The statement said doctors feel the "optimal functioning of all organs and systems" makes it possible "to perform surgery with a high degree of certainty and confidence."

The physicians met at the Barvikha government health resort outside Moscow where the 65-year-old president has been resting up for his operation and undergoing unspecified preparatory treatments.

In addition to heart trouble, he had an underactive thyroid, internal bleeding and severe anemia.

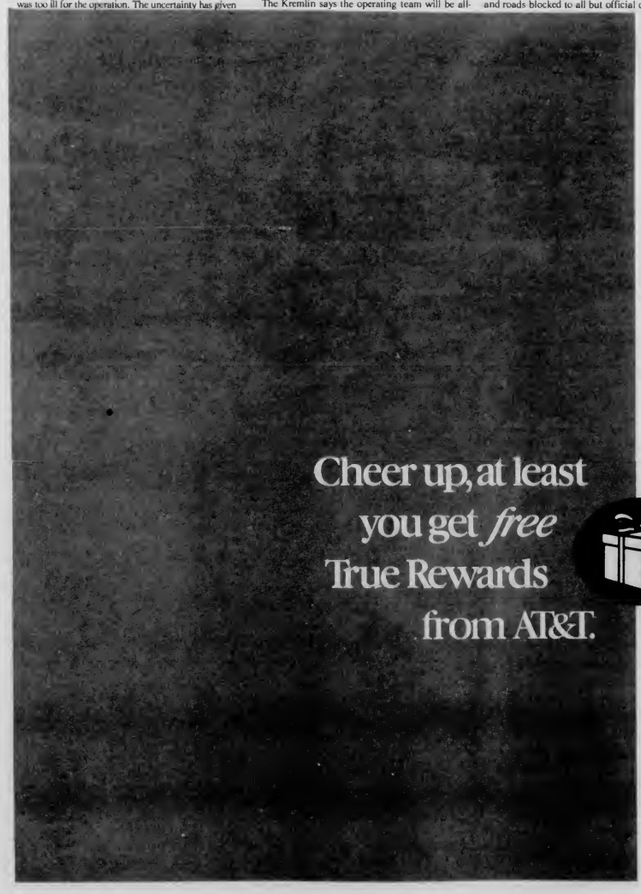
DeBakey has said that Yeltsin needs a triple or quadruple coronary artery bypass and should be able to resume a full schedule after six to eight weeks of recuperation.

The Kremlin says the operating team will be all-Russian and will be led by Dr. Renat Akchurin, who trained with DeBakey in 1984 and performed Chernomyrdin's bypass operation eight years ago. The surgery was expected to take six to eight hours.

The Kremlin has been stingy with information about Yeltsin's health, even going so far as to cover up a heart attack during his re-election campaign. DeBakey acknowledged last week that Yeltsin's family wants a news blackout until after the operation.

The head of the Russian Orthodox Church yesterday offered a special prayer for the ailing Russian leader at the Cathedral of the Icon of the Holy Virgin of Kazan on Red Square.

"Cure his illnesses, heal the ailments of the body and of the soul of the president of Russia," Alexy II, patriarch of Moscow and All Russia, intoned. "Bless him with a speedy recovery and give him health."



Alexy also called on all Russians to pray for the president's recovery, a tradition dating to the Russian czars.

Security has been tight around the center since Sunday, with dozens of police officers in position and roads blocked to all but official cars.

My own back pages

Milestones are funny things. Sometimes you notice them, sometimes you don't. Although many occur by virtue of your just being around for awhile, milestones are best when they show you've achieved something, that you've done something with the life you've been given.

This is my 50th column.

Over the course of two years, 40,000 words, two photo headshots and dozens of letters to the editor, much has happened to this columnist. Now comes a time for looking back, re-evaluating events of the past and preparing for the future.

Mark McGrath

There was a time when I didn't recognize the power of the written word. When I took this regular column space for granted. When it seemed that I had no real goal, save for angering the people I didn't like or didn't agree with or didn't even understand.

There were times when I judged success as the number of complaints coming into the office. While not an easy thing to admit, the fact that I seem to have been able to progress beyond that point makes an important point about the evolution of personal opinions and their flexibility.

Being a columnist offers me the unique opportunity of keeping a progression of writings and thoughts... a growth chart if you will. Looking back is a fun, yet embarrassing endeavor. Certain ideas jump off the yellowed clippings and straight to the gut, filling it with a nauseating feeling.

During my freshman year, I wrote a column about freedom of speech, freedom of the press and freedom of expression. I said that these freedoms, while the original intentions were good, were not being respected by those who use them. I suggested that because people use them to justify hatred and ignorance that we might have been better-served without them. As a reference, here are a few quotes from that column:

- "Americans are given too much freedom."
- "If James Madison could see how his First Amendment was being used, he'd probably die a second time."
- "I'm sick of hearing a bunch of idiots running around, speaking words of hatred and carrying around a copy of the Bill of Rights."
- "Right now, free speech, one of our most sacred rights is one of the most disturbing aspects of our society because in the instances where it is used, the 'free speakers' misuse it, and instead of being the bastion of freedom originally intended, it has become a bastion of cowardice and hatred."

I think you get the point. Two years later, I can only shake my head. I believed what I was writing at the time, but I don't know how I achieved such a distorted perception.

There I was, picking on the very document and tradition which gave me the right (privilege) to voice my opinion without fear. Even more upsetting was the fact that I was criticizing those who use given freedoms to say or print irrational ideas, a classification which undoubtedly included my own.

When looking at America in comparison with other countries, which themselves may not offer such freedoms, it becomes clear that a large part of what makes America the wonderful country it is are those very same freedoms.

Having been part of "the press," I have learned that a free press is what protects Americans from the possibility of lost civil rights. Having a non-government-affiliated press insures that individuals can at least keep an eye on what is happening as a way of checking the system.

Our freedom of speech is invaluable. If there were no free speech, the United States government would be stagnant because anyone who moved for change could be shut down. The ingeniousness of the Constitution is that it is a living document, that it can change with the times as can our society. Nothing is permanent.

Similarly, our lives and opinions can change. If we happen to fall victim to a temporary funk somewhat reminiscent of Fascism, we have the option of living and learning and moving on. As students, it is our responsibility to challenge our own opinions, to strive for true enlightenment. Being a student means possessing the right to experiment with different ideas, to try them on and dispose of the ones that don't fit us or society.

To definitively say that any one person's opinion is invalid or not to let it exist is to take away their right to progress and grow. To question and entertain your own personal opinions and those of others as a student, regardless of how they are accepted in present day society, is essential if you'll ever be able to make similar judgement calls once the safety of a learning environment is taken away.

A couple of years ago, I wrote a column that now seems incredibly inaccurate and near-sighted. While I regret having written a few words, I will never be able to take them back. So here, it is best that they remain there in my scrapbook, a testament to the fact that perhaps our most interesting right is the right to change.

Mark McGrath is a Collegian columnist.

Cat and mouse

As children, we were taught that police officers are our friends. As teenagers, they became our nemeses, as we found mischief and got our driver's licenses. Now as college students, police officers are buzzkills who cruelly confiscate kegs and issue warnings that rupture relations with our landlords.

While I appreciate that these dutiful civil workers are merely doing their job to keep the peace, I can't help but believe that some of them also get a little rush out of ruining a good time. These men in uniform are sometimes the grown-up versions of the hall-monitors and tattle-tales of our grammar school days.

Suzanne Barber

Police officers would be lying if they said they were not inspired to enter their profession after watching Ponch and John bust the bad guys on their California Highway Patrol. But in reality, that kind of excitement doesn't happen in the day-to-day of small town police departments.

So, we as fun-loving college students have to just humor them while they play out their cop-and-robber fantasies. Deep down, though, we all know that the antagonizing and bantering are only superficial games. Our opposing views exist only by virtue of each of our positions. "Tom & Jerry," for example, spend their entire lives chasing each other but they sometimes team up against some other foe and prove that they don't really hate each other. They're just doing their jobs as cat and mouse. Consider it a metaphor for college students' relationship with police officers.

This summer I was enjoying myself at a party in a small town on Cape Cod when the unwelcome guests (a.k.a. police) burst in. I don't think the door of the house was open, however in small town, things like standard operating procedure are strategically over-looked. Once they were in the house, the manner in which these officers conducted themselves was pure comedy.

"Well, well, well..." the officer oinked as he strutted into the room. He did all the talking while his two silent partners tried to look busy surveying the scene. Without a word, they lugged away the keg. Any normal police officer would have issued a warning and called it a night, but that night on the Cape, Roscoe P. Coltrain was on duty and he was bored.

"Someone's going to jail," he threatened as he walked up to each person confronting each of their poker-faces with a condescending glare. This went on for a while and I tried to make no sudden movements or break my expressionless stare. He finally gave up his rampage but before he swaggered out of the room, he said, "There's a new sheriff in town" — swear to God. (And people think I watch too much T.V.?)

After I burst into wild laughter, I left the broken-up party. They had their power trip and we had a good laugh — no harm done.

These few silly power-hungry police officers have created the lasting stereotype of the hokey, bumbling police squad in a small town eating doughnuts and packing heat. However, police in the Amherst area have redeemed their profession by protecting the town in a non-threatening manner. Within the past few months, I have found a new respect for the boys in blue. They provide order — –that's their job. Though some may get a little rush out of crashing a party, there are others who wish they could join us.

One night during the first week of this semester, police on duty had been working their way down the street breaking up parties but spared one. It was still warm outside and we were loud. Most of the noise was being made by the not-so-fun drunk guy who continually played chop-sticks on the discarded piano that had been left outside by previous tenants. The police officer asked the guy at the piano to stop playing. The kid moved over to make room for the officer who promptly began playing the "Piano Man," while his partner aimed a flashlight at the keys. Bewildered, everyone at the party looked at each other, unsure of the proper etiquette when the 5-0 breaks into song. After he finished, he just walked away, without saying a word.

They don't make the rules they just enforce them.

Bill and Bob's choice meat

Where I'm from, Bill and Bob are synonymous with a great roast beef sandwich. Bill and Bob's restaurant offers a large variety of deli sandwiches and burgers. Choosing what to order has never really been that difficult. When I was younger, my parents would recommend to me what was good on the menu and that advice would help me decide on a dinner. There wasn't a lot at stake. If my sub wasn't what I wanted I could just get something else.

Sarah Kimmel

I'm now 18, on my own, and the decisions I'm making aren't as simple as choosing a meal off a menu. Bill and Bob are no longer two guys who run a sub shop, they're the two guys who are feuding to run this country. To be completely honest, I know as much about Clinton and Dole as I do about the restraunt owners.

It baffles me how there were hundreds of students on campus encouraging me — the unregistered voter — to register, yet they weren't telling me about the issues. I know that it is entirely my fault that I don't know anything about the candidates. If the information wasn't in the tabloids or in blood drawing television commercials I haven't heard it. How am I supposed to vote for the President if I only know their name, who they cheated on their wife with and if they ever inhaled?

You're thinking to yourself, how pathetic is this kid? Well, I'd bet money that I'm not alone in this situation. How much do you think the average voter actually knows about the candidates? The difference is that I want to know before I go into the voting booth. Some people go into the booth thinking, "Perot looks like Frank Purdue so I don't think he will get my vote. Dole remembers the last '96 election and Clinton didn't inhale. I guess I'll vote for my cat and get this over with." This is just a hunch, but that isn't what I think the forefathers had in mind when they gave people the right to vote.

It seems to me that in the past two elections, though I couldn't vote, I knew all about the candidates and the issues at hand. The fact that Bush hated broccoli and that he hurled all over the Prime Minister of Japan never influenced my opinion about him. Today, that could have made all the difference in my ballot pick. I wish that I knew now what I knew then. It's so hard to know whether to laugh at the rumors that fly around about the candidates or to take them into careful consideration.

Do I believe that the meat is grade D, but edible, or do I just chew up the burger and forget about it?

Life isn't purrrfect

The other day, I was sitting in my apartment when a stray cat strolled up to my patio door and began meowing. Feeling sorry for the little guy, I jumped up and grabbed a piece of turkey out of the fridge. As I opened the door to offer the cat this tasty morsel he immediately lunged toward the opened door. Unfortunately we aren't allowed to have pets in the apartment so I couldn't let him in. Instead I could only give him the turkey, which he wholeheartedly accepted.

Andrew Trodden

It was clear to me by the way this cat had acted that it was not a wild cat, that it had lived the comfortable life for some time previously. But at this point it was getting a taste of the real world for a change. Maybe by choice maybe not, but either way it wanted it's little slice of the comfortable life back. He had tasted the outdoor world away from the protective blanket of his former owner and realized that sleeping under the stars day in and day out was no picnic. He wanted back in, back to the pillows and laundry baskets. But he couldn't have it, he could taste it, smell it, hear it and see it but he may never again feel it.

It wasn't until a couple of days later that I realized the irony in the whole situation and how symbolic that cat may be of me.

Here I am in my senior year of college and the end can't come soon enough. I hate school. I want out of here. I want the real world now. Classes are boring. I am completely disinterested in all of them, which would explain why I miss so many. On top of that I'm broke. I've even lost weight because sometimes I don't eat enough. I'm hungry right now.

But unfortunately I can't just up and leave. I have to get that little piece of decorated paper that says I'm an educated thinker. Because, of course, I could never be a smart person without it.

Diploma. Say it 10 times to yourself then try to convince it doesn't sound like a form of cancer. But of course it's not. We've all been hoodwinked into believing that it's some sort of panacea that will wash away all our worries once we wrap our little paws around it.

Wrong.

That's when you get booted into the real world and no matter how much you pin that thing on your chest there's no way your getting a job without kissing someone's behind.

So what the hell am I doing here? I know what I want to do with my life and frankly I don't think I need a diploma to do it. I certainly, absolutely, positively, without a doubt in my yet-to-receive-diploma mind do not need four semesters of Spanish. I speak English and will continue to do so.

Anyhow the point I'm shooting for is that maybe school and life both suck right now but no matter how hard it is for me to believe it, I'm still living that comfortable life. The comfortable life that cat wishes he had back. While I long for the real world, this cat, this being of lesser intelligence knows all to well that the real world is no fun place to be. Unless of course you've got your diploma and chap-stick on.

I guess I just need to realize that the end will come— and probably quicker than I'd ever imagine. And that I should probably treasure the last months that I have under the blanket of protection that my parents are still providing for me. Because once I'm out from underneath it, I may not like what I find, and it could be too late to crawl back in.

As for the cat, he comes by the patio door every so often, looking for food, maybe a way inside, or maybe just a little warm company to make him feel loved again. I hope he comes by again today, I may just let him in.

Letters to the Editor

In defense of the CC Store

To the editor:

Before we continue to label the University Store and it's employees racist and public (student) enemy number one, I think it is important to inject some factual information and a little bit of moderation into the debate. Many attacks have been made on the University Store in the past few days, many of them unsubstantiated and unfair. In addition, most students on this campus are ignorant of who the University Store is and what services it provides.

First of all, the University Store is a part of our University. It is not a privately owned bookstore. The store is part of a group of campus services that includes the Textbook Annex, the munchies, Food Services, Conference Services and many more. All the profit from the store goes back into the University. This factor is especially important since many of these other services are money losing propositions. The store is small and therefore does not have the buying power to have discount prices. Students are not limited to shopping at the University Store. In addition the store stocks many items that are not normally carried in other stores. The store carries this large diversity of products as a service to the University community, it is not cost effective for the store to do so.

The people that C.F. Gorospe (Oct. 29) encountered in the Art and Customer Service departments were most likely students. The store hires a large number of student employees as a service to the student community. This provides an opportunity for students who have a heavy class schedule to still make some money which many of us need. Many of the students are indeed rude, unfriendly and less than helpful. However, you can catch attitude from a student employee anywhere on campus and for that matter in the five college area, regardless of you race, creed, or religion. Sadly, some students just don't want to work and have very poor customer skills. It is not a racial issue. If the University Store is guilty of anything, it is guilty of being too lenient on bad student employees.

Finally, I would urge members of this student community to take great care and concern when making racial accusations. These kinds of accusations are very powerful, particularly in a university setting. They have the power to hurt innocent individuals, ruin careers, and cause innocent people to lose their jobs when used unjustly and improperly. The University Store is not full of raging ignorant bigots. For the most part, it is full of employees with families that have worked hard over the years for the University community. They take pride in the students and our University and are extremely hurt by the blanket accusations being thrown at the store and its employees. Please work together to solve the problems in our community, instead of complicating the issues with groundless, blanket accusations. There is a strong power in racial accusations, I hope that you will use that power responsibly.

Gamblers pack into ALANA casino night

By Lia Wong
Collegian Correspondent

Gamblers were all over the place last Friday night, at the second annual Office of ALANA (Asian, Latino, African- American, Native American) Affairs (OAA) Casino Night.

This fund-raising event, held in the Campus Center Auditorium, opened to the public at 7:15 p.m. The proceeds will be used to fund upcoming events held by the OAA.

The event featured 20 blackjack tables, the wheel of fortune and roulette; all of which were rented from Casino Productions. The auditorium was full from the time the doors opened to the close of the event at 1:30 a.m.

People gambled to the accompaniment of music provided by Concepto Latino. Volunteers, dressed in white and black, worked all night to keep the activities going.

Nelson Acosta, Director of the OAA affairs thanked all of the 100 plus volunteers who helped with the event.

Graduate Assistant to the OAA and Pit Boss for the night, Karsten Cash said that the event was a great opportunity for ALANA students and their allies to work together as well as benefiting the programming and administration of the office.

"It is very rare that we can meet in a forum that works toward a professional goal and have fun doing it," said Cash.

The event was organized by the staff of the OAA who have been working on it since the beginning of the semester.

Acosta gave special thanks to Gene Pacifico, Jenny Diune, Jalil Mendoza from the OAA and Matthew Auger of the CCSUC as well as the entire staff of the OAA.

"They've worked very hard and put in crazy hours to make this happen... If there were other sources of funding, we wouldn't have Casino Night. This is our most important fund-raiser since we don't get a line item budget from the Administration, nor do we get enough funding as it is. We've been here since 1976," said Acosta.

"I had fun. I won, but if I had lost, it would have been worth it... going to a good cost," said graduate student, Wellington Bencosme.

"[It was] nice seeing people supporting ALANA... I hope that people continue to come in the future," said senior SOM and HRTA major and volunteer, Gilberto Mendez.

"Its nice seeing people enjoying themselves... I'll definitely volunteer again. Knowing so many people volunteering for ALANA is great feeling," said Alfonso Bencosme.

Cash would like to give special thanks to Jeffery Wong who came from Boston and volunteered all night. His efforts are indicative of the hard work of ALANA students towards ALANA programming and education.

According to Acosta, there will be another Casino Night held next semester which the office is already planning for.

This event was co-sponsored by AHORA, the ALANA Caucus, Asian American Students Association, the Black Student Union, Campus Center Bluewall Cafe, Campus Center Hotel, Campus Center/Student Union Commission (CCSUC), Casa Dominicana, Concepto Latino, The Daily Hampshire Gazette and the Collegian.

SCUM hosts weekend festival

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

This Veterans' Day weekend, science fiction lovers will attend the 12th annual Not Just Another Con (NJAC) science fiction convention. It will be held at the Murray D. Lincoln Campus Center Hotel at the University of Massachusetts.

NJAC is sponsored by the Science Fiction Conventioneers of UMass (SCUM). Organizers are expecting up to 300 people from the New England area to attend the convention.

Last week SCUM members ran a campus wide advertising campaign to inform students about the convention. It included mailing the NJAC newsletter to every student on campus.

"We are definitely more organized than last year. We have done tons of advertising and hopefully all our hard work will pay off," said David Jarvis, an NJAC organizer.

The guest of honor at this year's NJAC will be author Allen Stelle.

Stelle, a former journalist, is best known for his writings on the near future such as; The Tranquility Alternative, Labyrinth of Night and The Death of Captain Future.

Earlier this year, Stelle won the Hugo Award for excellence in Sci-fi writing for The Death of Captain Future. Members of the Worldcon, a world-wide sci-fi convention, nominate and vote on an author to receive the Huge award each year. Stelle has been writing about science fiction since the late 80's.

Dunn said that students do not realize how big of a job behind organizing the NJAC.

Jarvis added, "There's only so much time to work on NJAC. We also have classes and have to study as well as constantly plan."

NJAC will host an art show for both professional and amateur artists. The artists will display their originals at an auction on Sunday and prints will be on sale throughout the entire weekend.

Huckster's room is another highlight of NJAC. Attendees may purchase a wide variety of collectibles from antique books and phasers to Renaissance cloaks and gowns and a variety of games.

In addition, NJAC has many gaming events scheduled; workshops, panels and round tables will be held for gamers as well as live role-playing and board game strategies.

Tickets may be purchased for the Nov 8- 10 event at the door. Tickets are $12 for students and $17 for adults. Pre- registration is $10 for students and $15 for adults. Ticket prices cover the entire weekend or an $8 ticket may be purchased for one day. To pre-register and for more information call 545-1924 or visit the web site at www.umass.edu/rso/scum.

Man has a winning Plan

Zany mockumentary apt for election

By Adam Levine
Collegian Staff

MAN WITH A PLAN
Directed by John O'Brien with Fred Tuttle, Joseph Tuttle, Bill Blachly playing at Pleasant Street Theatre

Does anyone remember high school government history class, and how we learned about the American political system and how it was devised by our forefathers? Elected positions were supposed to be held by the common man, for after all he is most sensitive to our country's conflicts. Throughout the ills of time, those elected positions have become the standards associated with wealth and power, and far removed from your average working class citizen.

In his latest film, John O'Brien takes a sharp look at politics as usual by creating an immensely clever pseudo- documentary. He pokes harmless fun at all facets of government, from Congress itself to the voters who put them there and everything in between. Man with a Plan is hilarious because it successfully combines two extremes: politics and blunt honesty, and for the most part makes it work.

In order to create his satire, O'Brien decided to stage an election campaign of his real neighbor Fred Tuttle. The film begins with an explanation of why the 73-year-old Vermonter wishes to challenge six-term incumbent Bill Blachly in a race to Capital Hill. Tuttle needs a job that has great pay, excellent benefits and no need of a resume, so as his campaign slogan states "why not." If he wins his election bid, Tuttle can get a new clutch for his car, fix up his lumber ridden barn and help his father to pay his medical bills. Slowly but with admirable determination, Tuttle treks his way across the Green Mountain state, handing out flyers and kissing babies, and even some cows too. Eventually, Vermont begins to take notice of this abrupt and peculiar congressional contender.

Perhaps not the classiest guy, but charming in a strange way, Tuttle recruits the help of some of his friends to teach him pronunciation and proper demeanor. He attempts to absorb their knowledge and some of the film's funniest moments occur. The best laughs however, are during Tuttle's interviews with curious journalists where they ask him questions like,"so you're only running for Congress for the money?" Tuttle answers with such calmness, "yeah sure, you know they make $80,000 a year." The reporter then corrects him, "they make a lot more than that." Tuttle then explains, "well I'll take whatever they want to give me."

Man with a Plan lies somewhere in between This is Spinal Tap and Bob Roberts but for the most part exceeds them both. At times though, the quirky humor is to odd for its own good. When Blachly begins to get nervous of Tuttle's rapid rise in the polls, he hires a sleazy photographer to get pictures of his new opponent involved in an orgy. When the story remains on target focusing on the ridiculousness of modern day politics and eccentric New Englanders, it works great. When Tuttle explains that the best way to take care of the country's garbage is to take it to Cape Canaveral and blast it off in to space, you at first chuckle.

The more one thinks about his solution, you can begin to see that perhaps the answers are a lot easier than our real leaders want them to be. A–

The Black Crowes need to learn to shake more than their moneymaker.

Crowes a bit too hard to handle at Mullins

By Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

BLACK CROWES
Mullins Center
Nov. 3

South Family Robinson and crew docked for one night at the Mullins Center Sunday night, as the Black Crowes sailed into Amherst on their Three Snakes and One Charm tour.

Clocking in at just over two hours, the concert featured selections culled mainly from the Georgia rockers' latest release, with few tunes from their three previous albums. It was an eclectic and daring decision at best for the Crowes, who, for better or worse, opted to leave out dynamic older material like "Remedy," "Twice As Hard" and "Sometimes Salvation."

In spite of these omissions, lead singer Chris Robinson proved that he is the captain of this Pinafore right from the opening number, a cover of the Joe Cocker classic, "Feelin' Alright." While the arrangement remained conservatively, yet soulfully faithful to the original, Robinson's wailing reinterpretation of the vocal line breathed more than enough life into the tune to get the show off to a running start.

Robinson has clearly taken his vocal cues from old-school R&B legends like Otis Redding and Percy Sledge — and it shows. His six-foot-plus, 100-lb.-and-change frame conceals a voice that resonates in the live arena with more power and conviction than in recordings.

The same cannot be said for his backing mates, whose onstage sound, while energetic and loose, lacks the punchiness they capture so capably in their studio efforts.

Most notably, guitarist Marc Ford's soloing seemed to lose both its stinging tone and enthusiastic phrasing, as the leadman waded through a series of pleasantly melodic, but familiar and dull Southern rock staple licks.

Another problem arose in the form of improvisational jams, not the Crowes' strong suit. They are a unit best served by keeping their tight compositions tight, since neither Ford nor Chris Robinson is a sufficiently charismatic lead player to rev up an audience.

Unlike the Allman Brothers Band, whose style the Crowes inevitably evoke, this quintet (which also features Johnny Colt on bass, Steve Gorman on drums and Eddie Hawrysch on keyboards) does not have the musical prowess necessary to pull off a rousing jam. Only Hawrysch's lilting and fluid contributions stood out, but these were limited to only a few brief interludes.

On the whole, the show was entertaining but not outstanding, as songs like "A Conspiracy" and "Thick 'n' Thin" found their way into a long set dominated by fresh tunes like "Good Friday" and "Evil Eye."

Unfortunately, even Chris Robinson seemed to sleepwalk his way through the Shake Your Money Maker hits "Hard To Handle" (smarily reinvented with a slowed down, rumbling New Orleans backbeat reminiscent of Little Feat) and "Jealous Again."

The latter featured Rich Robinson sharing lead vocals with his brother, a trend the Crowes may want to reconsider continuing. The elder sibling's thin and reedy voice, along with the weak backup duties performed by the other band members, is evidence that the group may want to invest in a few solid backing singers to compliment the quite capable Chris Robinson.

Opening act Government Mule, a trio fronted by Allman Brothers singer/guitarist Warren Haynes, played a hellraiser of a 45-minute set, anchored by Haynes' barn-burning solos.

The Great War re-examined

New documentary shows WWI's horrors

By Denis Anderson
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Near the 20th century's end, with Russia in turmoil; Sarajevo in ruins and thousands of Gulf War veterans suffering the effects of chemical weapons, a documentary about World War I could not be more timely.

The first global conflict of the 20th century ignited in Sarajevo. It introduced the horrors of chemical warfare, the mass aerial bombardment of civilians and the first systematic genocide, the annihilation of the Armenians by the Turkish government. "The Great War And The Shaping Of The 20th Century," premiering nationwide on PBS stations at 9 a.m. Saturday Eastern time and continuing the next three nights, examines this horrifying historical pageant with the kind of depth and sweep that Ken Burns applied to his masterly examination of the Civil War.

Flowing from the patriotic fever that gripped Russia, Germany, Britain and France, World War I consumed 9 million lives from five continents and toppled the crowned heads of Europe, except for Britain's.

The 1914-1918 conflict stopped without really ending, paving the way for the terrors of World War II, the Holocaust and the Cold War.

And yet, World War I has been so overshadowed by the Second World War that it's been 30 years since the airing of a major documentary about the conflict once called "the war to end all wars."

The warfare of 1914-18 with its craters, machine guns, massed artillery and gas seems so long ago and far away. Yet it's really recent and near.

In my grandmother's home, there was a faded, brown photograph of a serious young man in stiff soldier's "doughboy" collar.

"That was your grand-uncle, Otto," my aunt told me. "He was killed after the Armistice. The word hadn't gotten down to the men in the lines."

The Armistice, Nov. 11, 1918, the day the guns fell silent. The term sounds dated as the old family photograph. Yet, had the guns fallen silent a day earlier, Otto Turley might have lived. We might have known one another.

Otto Turley was one of the 52,000 American dead from that distant war. Nearly as many killed during about eight months of combat as there were in as many years in Vietnam.

British, French, German and Russian dead numbered in the millions, along with the victims of other countries and colonies.

Twenty thousand British dead in one day's fighting in the Somme offensive. The numbers are numbing.

Halloween jazz suits Bela Fleck & the Flecktones

By Jeremy Kipp
Collegian Staff

BELA FLECK AND THE FLECKTONES
Iron Horse Music Hall
Oct. 31

Maybe it's a good thing how few music fans realize the incredible talent behind the funkadelic/jazz quartet Bela Fleck and the Flecktones. On Halloween night the band crammed in two, up close and personal shows at the Iron Horse.

Largely due to their unique banjo/synth-axe drumitar combination, the band puts on a passionate performance as chronicled in their latest double-album Live Art.

On stage, bassist Victor Wooten, drumitarist Future Man and reed-virtuoso Paul MaCandless took traditional supporting roles and turned them into joyous and improvised leads.

The show began appropriately "Up and Running" as the band's upbeat tempo and energy never stopped, moving swiftly into strong versions of "Em Guit" and "Scuttlebutt."

Special guest Paul MaCandless completed the quartet with extravagant solos on the oboe and assorted reed instruments on selections like "Landing" and "D 6/8," a show-closer which featured a tremendous rock-n-roll electric-banjo solo from Bela Fleck himself.

To add to the collage of musical styles the group moved into "Far East Medley," an exploration influenced by their overseas trips to Mongolia and Indonesia.

Bassist extraordinaire Vic Wooten, who returns on his own to the Iron Horse on Nov. 22, blisters through a solo entitled "Vix 9."

Fleck obliged a crowd member in a playful "Happy Birthday" rendition, with rings of "The Addams Family Theme" amongst cascades of banjo lightning flashes. A standing ovation brought the group back on stage for a "More Love" jam, featuring the only vocals of the night by Future Man.

"Local Boys Make Good?" UMass alums, Buffalo Tom, return to the Valley.

UMass' Buffalo Tom back again

By Mike Burke
Collegian Staff

Since leaving the University of Massachusetts in 1988, Buffalo Tom has made quite a name for themselves. Along with the Pixies and Dinosaur Jr., the trio has taken their Amherst roots around the world on many occasions. While not as influential as the Pixies or Dino Jr., Buffalo Tom has outlasted their rivals with a simple, consistent formula.

After leaving UMass, the band, featuring Bill Janovitz, Chris Colbourn and Tom Maginnis, signed to SST the groundbreaking independent label which featured Sonic Youth, Husker Du, the Meat Puppets and Dinosaur Jr.

Their early sound was far harsher than anything the band has done recently. Dinosaur's lead man J Mascis even produced their debut self-titled album. The effect was obvious — was this Dinosaur Jr. Jr.? Their first legitimate college radio hit "Birdbrain" remains one of the finest late-'80s tunes.

Since their departure from SST the band turned down their amps but never allowed their integrity to suffer. With several albums under their belt on Beggars Banquet and East-West the trio has proven to be one of the few sure bets left in the alterative music world.

As they mature musically, the albums have drifted far away from their SST roots but in concert the band never fails to relive their old days. At their last gig on campus, 1995's Spring Concert, Buffalo Tom opened with "Birdbrain" to the crowd's delight. This classic song remains the highlight to every Buffalo Tom concert. Unfortunately Janovitz, the main songwriter and singer, lost his voice leaving the band to concentrate on Colbourn's tunes. But sure enough Colbourn pulled up the slack to prove there are legitimate songwriters in the band, though Janovitz receives the credit.

Thursday's show should be one of the better rock performances to pass through the Iron Horse this semester. Although the venue gears away from loud guitar music, the Iron Horse should prove to be a prime place to see one of UMass' top former bands. They sure have come along way since their weekly gig at the top of the Campus Hotel!

Buffalo Tom performs two shows at the Iron Horse Music Hall Thursday night at 7 and 10 p.m. Call the club at 584-0610 for more information.

Mad Mel Gibson talks about success

NEW YORK (AP) — When Mel Gibson looks back on the road taken to superstardom, the first thing that comes to mind is coffee.

"Yeah, coffee. It kind of reminds me of coffee," he goes on, those famous eyes twinkling.

Then he explains: "When I made The Year of Living Dangerously, I'd made a few films before that — and they'd made money. So I was viable. But if my name came up, people still would go, 'Who?' "

That was in 1983 and Freddie Fields, then the head of MGM studios, decided to change all that.

"He had been an agent and he had a flair for using the machine," Gibson recalls before adding — in his best cigar-chomping-movie mogul voice — "We're going to make this kid a star."

Not that he's complaining. For Gibson says he enjoys being a star, even likes saying hello to people on the street.

He even likes promoting his pictures, he says, for they give him a chance to meet with a tough audience — film critics — who provide instant feedback on how he did.

He's deeply immersed in that part of the process now, holed up in a Central Park South hotel suite, doing a weekend of non-stop interviews to promote the film Ransom. He was up late the night before, up early the day of the interview and is exhausted, for which he is apologetic.

Aside from the opportunity to work with director Ron Howard, Gibson says he took the role for the chance to play a character whose perfect life falls apart on every level, and who discovers that everyone around him — from the kidnappers to the cops to his wife — is neither all good nor all bad. He had his own share of real-life problems, from an appendectomy to arthroscopic knee surgery, during filming.

COURTESY LORLEY SEBASTIAN

Does anybody glare better than Gibson? Ron Howard directs Gibson in Ransom.

"But it's good. It kind of makes you aware that, you know, you'd kind of better start cycling or something," says the trim and fit-looking Gibson, who recently turned 40.

Having starred in and won an Academy Award for directing 1995's "Braveheart," he decided to pass on directing this year, in part because he didn't want that much responsibility again so soon.

"It's nice to see someone else twisting in the wind for awhile," he says seriously. At the same time, though, he's looking at future directing projects.

Someone who once considered becoming a journalist - "being off in some foreign place, sending back stories, kind of a romantic notion to it, I suppose" — he's made his peace with the media after some early run-ins.

"I used to resent a lot of stuff," he recalls. "Like one day I'd be talking to somebody and a week later I'd read back what they'd written and [looking horrified] I'd say, 'But it's all a bunch of... lies.'

"But I let that stuff slide off now because, you know, it wasn't the first time, it won't be the last. Besides, I've had everything said about me now that can be said."

became known as "The Lost Generation."

Where the CBS project was, by turns, jaunty and nostalgic, this new view of the century's first global calamity is wrought with the pathos and dread of those who experienced the war firsthand.

The common soldiers sharing the misery of the trenches get their due, even reverence. But the heartbreak and struggle of women isn't overlooked.

Narration includes the poignant verse of life amid the mud and blood from poets like Wilfred Owen and Siegfried Sassoon, and the accounts of women who lost their men, women who nursed torn bodies and souls, women who lost their youth in munitions factories.

"There is a moral purpose to doing a series like this," Winter said. "It's to identify the extent to which the chaos of the world hasn't come out of thin air, but instead comes directly from the events of our parents' and grandparents' lives."

The cast of narrators includes Ralph Fiennes, Jeremy Irons, Liam Neeson, Yaphet Kotto, Martin Landau, Jane Leeves and Natasha Richardson.

COURTESY VIRGIN RECORDS

Altan crams Irish jigs & fun in area show

By Dan Bodah
Collegian Staff

Altan, perhaps the best-known performers of Irish traditional music, packed Northampton's Iron Horse Music Hall for each of two sets Saturday night. In front of a sea- colored backdrop with faint Celtic designs, fingers flew over fiddle fretboards and picks plucked perfect percussion from bouzouki and guitar, accented by accomplished accordian accompaniment.

Altan plays frolicking reels, interspected with elegant jigs and slow, beautiful songs. Their music comes primarily from Country Donegal, whose music is, according to fiddler Ciaran Tourish, distinctive because "it's mainly fiddle oriented music... it's faster, more vigorous." Guitarist Daithi Sproule and bouzoukanist Ciaran Curran provide the rhythms that drive the music, while Dermont Byrne pumps melodies on accordian and Tourish and Mairaed Ni Mhaonaigh front the band with their fierce fiddling.

Ni Mhaonaigh sings lead vocals on the band's "songs," by which they mean any piece with lyrics. The performance was made up mostly of instrumental medleys of reels and jigs, frequently interrupted by Ni Mhaonaigh's clear, sure vocals on songs like "Blackwaterside," "Brid Og Ni Mhaille," "the Banks of the White Rock," and "Stor, a Ghra." Her voice has definitely become richer since Altan's early years, and Saterday found her in great form.

It's interesting that Altan's songs are mostly in Irish, a language barely spoken in it's own country. Tourish says "We're not on a crusade or anything, it just happened that Irish is Mairead's first language, that's why we sing what we do." Donegal is one of the view "Gealtacht" (Irish- speaking) areas left in Ireland. Although some Irish acts have even gone to the point of recording a hit single in Spanish, French, German, etc. For the various markets, Altan is content to stick with the language their songs come in.

In the liner notes for their albums, the band provides both the Irish original and translated English lyrics for their songs. In concert, however, lyrics in a language unrelated to English don't seem to be a problem. Tourish and Ni Mhaonaigh had a little joke with this on Saterday night, introducing "Brid Og Ni Mhaille" with the suggestion that we could learn Gaelic and be singing along by the end of the tune. According to Ni Mhaonaigh, if that was too hard, we could just "eat some garlic instead." Certainly the expressiveness of Ni Mhaonaigh's voice, along with the band's informative introductions to the songs, left them accessible to one and all.

However, much of Altan's strongest material doesn't have lyrics. It is unfortunate that the Iron Horse left no space free of tables so that people could dance, especially considering that Altan plays primarily dance music. Toward the end of the performance a few people got up and danced anyway, but there were so many waiters moving back and forth in the open places that things were a bit cramped. So the audience had to be content to sit, clap, and stomp their feet through a series of rousing and superbly performed tunes — "King of the Pipers," "Con McGunley's" "The Newfoundland," "Drowsy Maggie."

An outstanding performance was given by Byrne, Altan's newest member, on "Bunker Hill." Byrne seemed transfixed, with a far-off look and a faint smile, barely seeming to move his hands; however, the streams of quick, liquid notes that poured from his squeezebox surprised with their smooth articulation and effortless rhythm.

Altan live is a show to be seen—the band is made up of solid musicians who make their music "for fun," as Tourish says. Even on the sadder songs (such as the stately jig "A Tune for Frankie," which Ni Mhaonaigh wrote for her husband and Altan co-founder Frankie Kennedy after his death from cancer), the band manages to keep a joyful spirit. That's the Celtic magic of Altan.

ing the meet, UMass sophomore Julie Alexander outlasted the competition in the 200 breast, clocking a 2:33.60. She was followed by Amy Stephans, .13 seconds behind her.

Barbara Hickey had a solid day, finishing second in both the 500 and 1000 free (5:14.63 and 10:43.35 respectively), and helping her 400 Free relay team to a 3:44.76 second place finish.

"Everyone was psyched for this meet," said co-captain Hickey. "We have a lot of depth, and our freshman class looks good. We will be a good championship meet team."

Senior co-captain Jodi Walters added, "We didn't know what to expect. We came out and everyone swam great. They [Boston College] were shocked. Considering the fact that we were down by 30 points and came back is a great accomplishment."

Hickey and Walters were not dejected by the loss, rather they enthusiastically declared that they would love to race B.C. again, a certain sign that the team's attitude is right on track.

The next day, the team faced a much weaker foe easily outpointing Vermont. The team cruised to victory taking first in 11 out of 12 events.

Sophomore Meghan Matacera, freshman Claire Maker, and Hickey all scored double wins.

Matacera captured the 100 back (1:03.74) and the 200 back (2:18.57), while Maker nailed her two freestyle sprints, taking the 50 free (26.04) and the 100 free (56.09).

Other Minutewomen victories came from Kristin Schambach in the 1000 free, Amy Stephens in the 100 breast, and Marci Hupp in the 200 I.M.

The diving team aced the one and three-meter events; once again Rodriguez was the story. She qualified for the NCAA Zones on the one-meter board, springing away from the competition with 251.775 points.

Carpenter took second in the one-meter, then came back to lock up the three-meter with 212.10 points.

Lansky returned from her record breaking performance Friday to take the 100 and 200 fly, pacing the team to even its record in the young season at 1-1.

The team now has the difficult task of swimming on the road for their next seven meets. They will not return to the friendly confines of the Rogers pool until Jan. 19.

The first leg of their journey begins at Providence College this Saturday at 3:30 p.m.

V–Ball team heads east to Harvard

By Steven Grant
Collegian Staff

In its second encounter with an Ivy League opponent this season, the Massachusetts Minutewomen Volleyball team will travel to Cambridge to face Harvard tonight.

The squad from Curry Hicks Cage beat Harvard last season, rather handily, in a 3-0 sweep at home. The Minutewomen have won four of their last five matches, and boast a 20-7 record. Plus they already swept Brown earlier this season, a team which swept Harvard in the Crimson's last match.

The Crimson, however, are 10-14, and 4-3 in a weak Ivy League conference. They've dropped their last three matches by a combined score of 9-2 but Harvard is coming off seven straight road matches, and perhaps the return home will provide a spark.

But UMass coach Bonnie Kenny has worried about her team all season long, and this time is no exception.

"There's still a lot of things we need to work on as a team," she said. "Every time we try to worry about someone else, [it backfires]. But Harvard is a young team, and they've improved from last season. We'll have to be ready for them."

The Minutewomen, coming off of wins over St. Bonaventure and Duquesne, are led in kills by Dionne Nash (4.1 per game) and freshman Jill Meyers (3.3 per game, 313 total). Another freshman, Kari Hogancamp, leads the club in digs, averaging 3.9 per game. Her 361 total digs is also top for UMass.

Sophomore setter Katie Pearce (12.9 assists per game), Sarah Watters (21 kills versus Rhode Island) and Michelle Paciorek (2.8 kills per game) have all been playing well for the Minutewomen, and have played key roles in the team's success.

Junior Elissa Hart paces the Crimson with 384 kills, 4.4 kills/gm and a .329 hitting percentage. She played well against the Minutewomen last year, and this time UMass will be ready for her.

"We're going to have to contain Hart offensively," said Kenny. "She put up some really good numbers against us last year. We're going to have to try to stop her."

Tops in digs for the Cambridge crew is Melissa Forcum, with an average of three per game. The sophomore outside hitter is also second in total kills with 244 and second in kills per game, with 2.9.

Minutewomen Notes... Kenny on the week ahead, which includes four matches in five days: "It's going to be a hard week. With seven bodies, [the four matches] will be a tough task." ... Junior Lesley Nolan and freshman Amanda Fleming remain on the injured list... UMass is 2-3 lifetime against the Crimson... After Harvard, UMass will begin a six-match homestand. Despite the all-time record, UMass has won the last two meetings with Harvard... UMass is only 5-5 on the road... After sweeping an opponent, 3-0, UMass has lost its following match four times. On Saturday, the Minutewomen swept the Duquesne Dukes, 15-10, 16-14, 15-2... The last time UMass was able to win more than two in a row was its fourth straight victory over La Salle on Oct. 4. Since then, the Minutewomen have had three two-match winning streaks... Katie Pearce has a mere two hitting errors in 56 attempts.

don't need a stopwatch to tell you that, you don't need a score. They leave the meets knowing how they did," O'Brien. "If we run our best day we could of won the Atlantic 10's, but I definitely thought we could of captured second."

The attention of coach O'Brien and the Minutemen is now focused towards the IC4A Championships, the qualifying for the NCAA championships. The IC4As will be held in Boston on Nov. 16, with only two teams from New England advancing to the NCAA Tournament in Arizona.

"Providence College should win and B.U., Brown and Dartmouth have a good shot at the second seed, but all of those schools are beatable. We don't even need our best day, just a day when all of our men run to what is expected," O'Brien said.

Those four schools all finished higher than UMass at the New England Championships. If UMass men's cross country wants to advance to the NCAAs, they need to step it up to their full capability at the IC4A Championships in two weeks.

BC gambling scandal deepens

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

NEWTON (AP) — At Pittsburgh, at the beginning of every season, coach Johnny Majors talks to his players about agents and gambling. At Syracuse, coach Paul Pasqualoni's speech is buttressed by representatives of the NFL and the local district attorney. But then, when the talking is done, the football players go back to their dorms, subject to campus temptations.

"When you're responsible for kids and you're not around them all hours of the day, some things can happen that you really hope wouldn't," Virginia Tech coach Frank Beamer said Monday about allegations of gambling on the Boston College football team. "There isn't any question that once the season gets started, you get really busy and that's the farthest thing from your mind," Majors said on the Big East conference call. "I talked about agents the other day. I didn't talk about gambling. But I'm going to bring that up tonight."

Boston College was hit with rumors this weekend that players had been betting on their own games, perhaps even betting on themselves to lose. The school is investigating and has asked the Middlesex County district attorney to assist.

Also, the Boston Herald reported Monday that the FBI has started its own investigation. Las Vegas oddsmakers took this Saturday's game against No. 17 Notre Dame off the board.

BC athletic director Chet Gladchuk, who began interviewing players on Monday, stressed over the weekend there was no evidence of any game-fixing or point-shaving but said the investigations were necessary to clear the program's reputation.

However, The Boston Globe quoted unidentified sources as saying that five or six players were involved, betting against the Eagles on more than one occasion. The Herald, citing unidentified students, put the number of gambling players as high as 13. A University statement issued Sunday night said the school was cooperating with the district attorney and the NCAA. The Rev. William Leahy, BC's new president, met most of the day Sunday with Gladchuk and officials from the district attorney's office.

"The situation is a very public issue right now," coach Dan Henning said during Monday's conference call. "I'm concerned about the health and welfare about all the players on the football team and all the coaches. We hope that somehow this comes to a swift resolution so we can move on and play."

Henning said he had made no changes to his roster for the Notre Dame game — the biggest game of the year for BC. Asked if it was safe to assume players would be suspended if there were any evidence of gambling, Henning said, "That's correct."

Henning's job was already in jeopardy because of his 15-17-1 record, with a 4-5 mark this season that includes a 20-13 loss to Pittsburgh on Thursday, a game that the Eagles were favored to win by 11 1/2.

Henning met with the team's senior captains and four other players on Saturday: Kiernan Speight, Jermaine Monk, Jamall Anderson and Brandon King, the grandson of boxing promoter Don King. Brandon King has not played this season because of a broken foot.

Asked on the conference call how it was determined which players were included in the meeting, Henning said: "I have no idea. They were in the room by themselves."

Security dispersed media from the area outside the meeting room on Sunday and most players did not comment. However, Speight told the Associated Press, "Right now I just want to get it resolved. When it all shakes down Kiernan Speight will be innocent."

The 8,800-student school was at the center of a basketball point-shaving scandal in 1982 when Rick Kuhn was sentenced to 10 years in federal prison for his role in fixing six games during the 1978-79 season.

BC had been an 11 1/2-point favorite against Pittsburgh on Thursday. The Eagles amassed 501 yards of offense and 32 first downs, compared with 375 yards and 16 first downs for Pittsburgh, which won 20-13.

HOROSCOPES

ARIES
March 21–April 20

You'll be called upon to make plenty of decisions this week. Be sure you know the difference between someone who genuinely wants your opinion and someone who just can't make a decision on their own.

TAURUS
April 21–May 21

It's planting time, so get it in gear! You'll be glad you did at harvest time. Now would also be a good time to change your eating habits for the better, since you're already thinking about vegetables.

GEMINI
May 22–June 21

Catch up on the whos and whats of everyday life with someone who seems very far away. They could be feeling left out of the circle, and your efforts will make a big impression. Don't toy with the affections of a sensitive person.

CANCER
June 22–July 22

Make an investment in a basic piece of equipment for your home. And don't skimp—the goal is to plan for the long haul. A decisive action you make could take some by surprise. Don't let their gasps faze you.

LEO
July 23–August 23

You're a sponge when it comes to information this week, so expose yourself to all kinds of things you've always been interested in. Pick one you especially like and sign up for a group that specializes in that.

VIRGO
August 24–September 22

Take careful inventory before heading off to the store. Something you have on hand could inspire your creative juices, and you'll save money. Clip coupons and put the money you save in a jar. With time, it could pay for a vacation with someone you have yet to meet.

LIBRA
September 23–October 23

Although you're a bundle of positive energy, you could meet with a great deal of resistance. Use extra tact, and lean on a few people if you think it necessary. Try not to make enemies lightly—they could cause trouble later.

SCORPIO
October 24–November 22

A compulsive borrower heads in your direction. Don't feel compelled to offer an excuse if you refuse. The best teacher is the school of hard knocks, and that might be exactly what is needed in this case.

SAGITTARIUS
November 23–December 21

A deadline looms, so put in extra time to ensure things are done right. You have other things you'd rather be doing, but don't shirk your responsibilities. You'll enjoy a social gathering, but resist the temptation to be the host.

CAPRICORN
December 22–January 20

If you can't avoid a conflict, then be sure that you're prepared with plenty of facts and figures to back up your position. There could be more at stake than it appears, so remain rational.

AQUARIUS
January 21–February 18

A younger person needs a helping hand on a big project. Offer them your time and expertise, but don't offer to do it for them. Your creativity lands you a big assignment at work. Plan an outline, and you'll wow your bosses.

PISCES
February 19–March 20

Pay extra attention to the arts this week. An event could have a special meaning for you that could reverberate throughout your life. Head for a party to show off your dazzling conversational skills.

Women's X–C ends season on top of A–10

By Corey Peter Goodman
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts has several talented teams that consistently compete among the best schools in their respective conferences. You read about their success everyday in the paper. But few can match the dominance the women's cross country team has displayed over their Atlantic 10 in recent years.

Saturday, at the Bronx's Van Cortland Park, head coach Julie LaFreniere strengthened her bid for another Atlantic 10 coach of the year award when her Minutewomen ran away with their fourth Atlantic 10 championship in six years.

"It was a complete team effort," LaFreniere said. "It may have been our best team performance of the season."

Though UMass finished with 35 points, a distant 59 points ahead of the second-place Lady Hawks of St. Joseph's, the meet, though, was not dominated by the Minutewomen from start to finish.

"We got a real scare from Virginia Tech," LaFreniere said. "Midway through the race they had several runners keeping up with Christy [Martin] and Katie [Greenia]."

But when UMass appeared from the woods for the final leg of the race, the Virginia Tech team had become the fabled hare when their quick start resulted in just a mediocre fifth-place finish.

UMass relied on their usual top five runners who all finished within the top 12.

Junior Rebecca Donaghue won the race, becoming the Atlantic 10 individual champion. Donaghue finished with nearly a half of a minute to spare as she separated herself from George Washington's standout runner Bridget Quenzer immediately after the gun sounded.

"Rebecca ran a great race, but it wasn't her fastest time of the season," LaFreniere said. "She wasn't challenged very much, so it was difficult for her to push herself."

Donaghue became only the second Minutewoman to ever win the Atlantic 10 individual title.

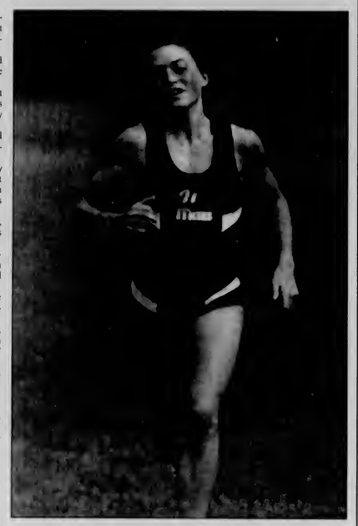
Christy Martin, ran one of her best races of the season, making her coach's pre-meet premonitions come true by finishing among the top five at 18:47.

"Christy has been coming on all year long, I expected this performance from her," LaFreniere said.

Besides her top 5 finish, Christy can be proud of her improvement since last month's trip to Van Cortland where she ran 20 seconds behind Saturday's time.

Katie Greenia, ran a tough race, finishing 6th while battling a serious respiratory illness.

"I was so proud of Katie's performance," LaFreniere said. "She's a gutsy runner who gave it her all despite being under the weather."



Molly Dunlap helped anchor the Minutewomen's squad as she finished 11th, with a time of 19:02.

"Molly ran a fantastic race, improving her time from her last Van Cortland appearance by 35 seconds," LaFreniere said.

Sharon Tillotson wins the Van Cortland Park improvement of the year award by cutting an unimaginable 45 seconds off last month's performance. Tillotson finished 12th overall, with a time of 19:08 that sealed the victory and the title for UMass.

"What can I say," LaFreniere said. "My kids stayed strong even when it looked like they were losing the race."

"The girls have a lot of heart and determination," LaFreniere said. "At the beginning of the season their goal was to repeat as Atlantic 10 champions. Saturday, they went out and achieved that goal."

Swimmers split two

by Chris Krein
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's swimming team opened up the 1996–97 campaign splitting two home dual meets. They fell in a heartbreaker to Boston College, 160–140, then came back the following afternoon and trounced Vermont, 176–91, in this weekend's action.

The team kicked off the season Friday night in the Joseph R. Rogers, Jr. pool facing bitter rival Boston College. They were hoping to avenge last year's embarrassing 80 point defeat to the Eagles.

"We have so many young people on the team right now, I didn't know how they would respond to a big meet environment. They came right in, and I'm really proud with how this team swam... everybody contributed." UMass head coach Bob Newcombe said.

UMass started slowly, however, and found themselves down by 31 points after seven events in the 16 event meet.

Jessica Farley kept the Minutewomen in contention, racing to a victory in the 200 free (1:59.49), while Amy Mullen took second in the same event (2:01.05). Lia Lansky crushed the previous UMass freshman record in the 200 fly, turning in a blistering 2:10.08 and securing the first place points.

Farley finished a stroke ahead of the pack in the 100 free, capturing the most hotly contested event of the day. She won with a 55.68, .02 seconds ahead of B.C.'s Kendra Johnson. The last place finisher turned in a 56.33, separating the first and worst by less than a second. Andrea Spencer, who would take the 100 fly later in the meet (1:01.09), placed third with a 56.00, edging out B.C.'s Rachel Enos by .01 seconds.

The Minutewomen's comeback truly began in the eighth event with junior diving sensation, Angelique Rodriguez, easily taking the one-meter victory with a score of 241.20. The comeback was complete as Rodriguez was even stronger in the three-meter competition five events later, scoring a 259.80. Her score automatically qualifies her for NCAA Zones at the end of the year, something she was unable to notch until late in the season last year. It is an outstanding accomplishment to lock up the bid not just early in the year, but in the first meet.

"Angelique is one of the best divers in the zone," noted Newcomb. "The group, in fact, is diving very well. Guy Pollino [UMass diving coach] has done a great job bringing them along."

She was joined by fellow divers Krystin Carpenter (215.625) and Kim Schadt (214.45) as the top three finishers in the three-meter, giving the team 16 points to B.C.'s three.

With two events to go, the score stood in the Eagles favor, 133–131, but it looked as if the momentum was decidedly with the home team, hoping to play the spoiler role.

Yet the momentum shifted back Boston's way as the Eagles finished 1–2 in the 200 I.M. leaving only a glimmer of hope for the Minutewomen, as the score stood at 147–136 entering the 400 free relay.

UMass prepared to swim the last event knowing it had to not only place first, but also take second to send B.C. packing with a loss. In a gallant effort, the relay teams took second, fourth, and fifth, but it was not enough for the upset.

Newcomb was pleased with the effort, nonetheless, proclaiming a "moral victory."

"We came storming back. Generally, our team has been a better first half team. This year we are a better second half team. That is something that we have definitely improved upon." He added,"We proved that last year's meet against Boston College was a fluke."

It is also worth noting that the team was without its best distance swimmer, three time school record holder, Karen Sonnwald, due to a fracture in her foot. The squad hopes to have her back in time for the Philadelphia Open in early December.

Minutewomen leave Totman in style; beat Yale 2–1

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts field hockey team needed overtime, but was able to come up with a 2–1 victory over Yale yesterday in what was probably the final game at Totman Field.

The win seals No. 8 UMass' regular season record at 14–5, 5–0 in the Atlantic 10. Yale drops to 9–7, 1–3 in the Ivy League.

The Minutewomen had several chances in the extra period, before they were able to put the Bulldogs away. With just over 13 minutes to go in overtime, Saskia Fuchs unloaded a shot just inside the circle. The ball careened off the cage's post, wide left.

With 12:41 remaining, Kate Putnam took a shot from the circle's edge that just missed putting the Bulldogs away.

Finally, UMass was able to put together the game-winning drive. Amy Ott controlled the ball, bringing it upfield to the Yale circle, where she fired a shot of her own. Yale cleared the ball, sending it to her left, where Fuchs picked it up and crossed it to a waiting Erica Johnston.

Johnston, who is recovering from a virus that put her in the infirmary for two days, reacted quickly, sending a shot to the back of the cage to give UMass the win.

"We knew the Yale goalkeeper would be good if we hit it right at her," UMass coach Pam Hixon said. "That's why we were trying to move her in the circle a little bit, instead of just taking long shots."

The Minutewomen struck first in the game, when Fuchs knocked home a shot with 23:36 remaining in regulation. After the Minutewomen took a free hit from the top of the circle while the Yale defense was still setting up, Putnam fed Fuchs. Fuchs collected the ball and pushed it past the Yale goalie, who was coming out to meet the shot.

Yale was not able to muster much offensive power after the UMass goal, until the team managed a penalty corner with 14:57 remaining.

Lindsay Hobbs put Yale on the board with the tying goal, with just 5:39 left in the second half. Hobbs was able to get the ball over UMass goalie Hilary Rose. Rose had gone to the ground to block another Bulldog shot, when Abigail Alt sent the loose ball to Hobbs for the score.

The Minutewomen almost won the game in regulation when Johnston crossed the ball in front of the Yale goalmouth. Laura Phelan, who made a successful move to the midfield after being hit in the face with a ball during UMass' game with Connecticut, dove for the shot, just missing Johnston's set-up.

Kerry Lyons, who has seen considerable time off the bench due to Johnston's recent illness, played a key role in keeping the Minutewomen in the Yale zone early in the contest.

With just under 17 minutes left in the first half, Lyons took the ball alone in the circle. Within the next six minutes, she was responsible for UMass receiving four offensive penalty corners.

"Kerry's been a very good player off the bench," Hixon said. "She accepts her role, she understands it. She's got good speed and she's good in the circle."

Rose was called on to stop six shots in the UMass net, while facing six Bulldog penalty corners.

Yesterday's game marked what Hixon definitively called the final game on Totman Field. There has been much discussion in recent years by the University and the Athletic Department to have Richard F. Garber Field turned into a turf field, to which the Minutewomen would move.

"This is the last game on Totman Field," Hixon said, matter-of-factly.

X–C pegs 3rd place in A–10

After the running down the Atlantic 10 title last year, the Massachusetts men's cross-country team was unable to repeat history Saturday and finished third overall in the A–10s at Van Cortlandt Park in the Bronx. Coach Ken O'Brien was hoping the depth and endurance on his squad would be enough to sustain victory over the five-mile trek.

"I'm disappointed, but not surprised. Last year we had a career day, this year Virginia Tech had a career day," O'Brien said, "We overhauled LaSalle, but we definitely could have overhauled St. Joe's. This [is] not the best race of the year. We didn't run as we are capable of running."

Virginia Tech came out of the Atlantic 10 victorious, with the low score of 28. Five of the top eight men crossed the finishing line wearing the brown and orange of the Hokies. Virginia Tech's top man, Van Arnold finished third overall with a time of 25:51.5. He finished behind Troy Harry of LaSalle at 25:32.9 and first place finisher Matt Byrne of St. Joseph's at 25:24.7.

St. Joseph's University and LaSalle both edged out Massachusetts earlier in the year during dual matches. On Saturday, UMass was able to conquer LaSalle, but St. Joe's capitalized on the Minutemen's less than par performance and stole second prize.

Junior Jonathan Way, of Marstons Mills, finished in an impressive fifth position, leading the Minutemen in their third place in the finals. His time was 25:56.6 which was just behind St. Joe's Byrne.

"Jon Way went right. That was pretty much it. He ran to the best of his capability and did as expected. Tim Boiland ran an impressive seventh, gaining forty-five seconds from his best time. Basically, two out 12 men ran to their capability or better," O'Brien said.

Other notables were Matt Behl who came in tenth at 26:03.3, Ryan Carrara who finished third for UMass at 14th at 26:22.5, Mike Macellaio, who topped 15th at 26:22.9, and Walter Stock who rounded out the top five for UMass, finishing 18th overall in 26:32.1.

"We have five men capable of running as a great second man. Jon ran as expected. We struggled basically. They're disappointed with their performance. You

UM drowns Vermont in opener

The Massachusetts men's swim team opened the season against Vermont this weekend.

Jonathan M. Place
Collegian Correspondent

Vermont found themselves in a whirlpool Saturday as the Massachusetts men's swimming and diving team beat the Catamounts 138 to 80 at Joseph R. Rodgers, Jr. Pool to capture it's first meet of the season.

It was a satisfying meet from every corner of the pool. Ed Hefferon of Stratford, Conn., made a splash in his collegiate debut, winning both the one- and three-meter diving events by scores of 233.325 and 267.325. His three-meter score, 267.325 is the fourth best in UMass history. Junior Matt Davey also swam for doubles Saturday, capturing the 200 free (1:48.35) and 100 free (48.51).

"I'm going to have to demand a little bit more from the team if we want to win. We have Providence and Boston University coming up, and we will have to play much better," Coach Russ Yarworth said, "We have quite a few problems with ineligible players and injuries, but we should be looking good in February when it really counts."

Other winners were senior Matt Getty taking the 200 IM, junior Sean Anderson who won in the 50 free, and sophomores B.J. Brannan and David Koritkoski, who made some waves and claimed the 500 free and 200 back.

"We got it done. We did what we had to do to win," Yarworth said.

Overall, it was a good start for the Minutemen of the chlorine sea. Next week the swimming team travels down to Providence, to splash the boards against Providence College on Saturday, Nov. 9.

"Providence will be tough, but they stopped all their swimming scholarships last year. So they probably don't have that strong of a freshman class. I'll know more of what to expect after their meet Wednesday night," Yarworth said.

Yarworth, in addition to his duties as swim and diving coach, is head coach of Massachusetts water polo, which will be in Cambridge this weekend at the Eastern Championships.

"I'm exhausted, but it's a lot of fun. I try to stay organized, and stay focused and I try not to spend to much time with one team. I hardly miss a practice for either team, but this weekend I'll be at Easterns, so I won't be in Providence. But I have really good assistants and they'll do a great job," Yarworth said.

Coach Yarworth didn't think it was a pretty win, but the Minutemen are content with a one in the win column. UMass is looking to stay healthy and competitive during the dual meets heading into the last week in February during the Atlantic 10 Championships.

Crew schooled at Dartmouth

By Jackie Leroux
Collegian Correspondent

The novices of the Massachusetts women's crew did not finish first this weekend, but they still came out as winners.

"They had a great time," said Kate Hubbard, of the women's crew office.

The novices traveled to Hanover, N.H. on Saturday to take part in their very first race; the Dartmouth Invitational, a novice only regatta. UMass sent three boats to the race, and they finished 10th, 11th and 13th, out of a field of 13 total boats. Even though they did not win, they came away having earned valuable experience.

This regatta was the first one for the Minutewomen. None of them had ever been to a race before, as either participants or spectators. On the other hand, most of their competition were recruited by their schools, and had four years of high school rowing under their belts.

The top finishers of the regatta were Radcliffe, Yale Dartmouth and Boston University.

The team would have liked to have done better, but for now they will settle for what they got. They feel as though they are on target and improving.

"We were satisfied with the outcome, but not ecstatic," Hubbard said.

One thing that must be understood about Saturday's regatta is that it was all in the spirit of fun. Its main objective was to help the novices get some experience. They got to see how a regatta works, and to get a feel for it.

While UMass sent three boats to the Invitational, a lot of other schools only sent two. The boats at the regatta were not stacked, so each boat had an equal amount of talent in it. When boats are stacked, coaches put rowers into boats according to their ability level, so one boat will have the best line-up in it.

The novices will take part in another experience-building race on Nov. 9, when they travel to Yale for the Yale Invitational. The Yale Invitational will also require boats that are not stacked. Their first real competition, and test of their ability, will come on Nov. 16, when they head to Boston for the Foot of the Charles.

Expect full recovery for Boris Yeltsin

MOSCOW — Boris Yeltsin's heart bypass surgery was pronounced a success yesterday and surgeons predicted a full recovery, easing anxiety that has hobbled Russia for months.

Yeltsin could take back his powers and the nuclear button in two days, but may not go back to his office until the new year.

The operation lasted seven hours.

Yeltsin regained consciousness about five hours later, was heavily sedated and was still on a respirator to guard against postoperative complications. Doctors said they couldn't predict when he could leave the hospital.

Dr. Renat Akchurin, leader of the 12-man surgical team that conducted the coronary artery bypass operation, said the number of bypasses "significantly exceeded" the three or four that doctors had speculated initially might be necessary. Doctors said Yeltsin's blood circulation had been significantly improved.

Akchurin refused to say how many bypasses were done. "I'd tell you immediately if I had his permission," he said. "It's his personal business."

Yeltsin's long illness has left Russia with a part-time leader at best and spawned power struggles among presidential wannabes.

Source: "Less likely" that bomb or missile

SMITHTOWN, N.Y. (AP) — While investigators began dredging the ocean floor for the last pieces of TWA Flight 800, a source said it appeared "less likely" that a bomb or missile downed the jumbo jet.

The source also discounted the missile theory, saying it was the least likely possibility of three scenarios investigators have recited repeatedly — bomb, missile or mechanical malfunction.

"We don't want to assign percentages to any of the three theories, but we are not seeing the type of evidence that we should be seeing if it was a bomb or a missile," the source said Monday.

"It's less likely now that it's a bomb or a missile because we have a whole lot more of the plane."

With the bomb, there should be a sign of chemical residue or pitting marks in the metal, but investigators have seen no evidence of that, the source said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

A missile would leave a much more destructive path with entrance and exit holes, which investigators so far have not seen, the source said.

The Paris-bound plane exploded into a fireball minutes after takeoff from New York's Kennedy Airport on July 17, killing all 230 on board.

Investigators know that the aircraft's nearly empty center fuel tank blew up but they can't figure out what sparked the explosion — a bomb, a missile or an unprecedented mechanical failure.

Pres. Clinton, Kerry, Olver prevail; GOP to hold Congress despite Mass. set-backs

■ Students help Democrats prevail in Mass., but political fate of two parties is still unclear

By Michael Elliott
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts voted decisively for Democratic candidates last night in a election which will, undoubtedly, raise more questions about American politics than it answers.

The tight senate race between Gov. William F. Weld and Sen. John F. Kerry proved to be less of a nail-biter than expected — with Weld offering a characteristically humorous concession well before the late night pundits even had a chance to assess the days results.

At midnight, the polls indicated that every Democratic incumbent in the Massachusetts Congressional delegation, including Rep. John Olver, will return to Washington without their two Republican colleagues, Rep. Peter Blute and Rep. Peter Torkildsen, both of whom seem headed towards defeat. The only race without incumbents, the 10th district battle between Democrat William Delahunt and Republican Edward Teague, appears out of reach for the GOP.

Massachusetts did not exactly vote for the self–proclaimed Republican "revolution" of 1994, making it difficult to use the Commonwealth as a benchmark of analysis for the rest of the Nation. Even Kerry's victory could be construed as a vote of confidence for Weld's gubernatorial performance, as opposed to popular preference for the Democrats.

Examining results across the country, the lines become even more unclear. Does Clinton's victory represent a endorsement of the Democratic platform? Considering that the Republicans will likely retain their control in Congress, this will probably not be the case.

On the other hand, the defeat of Bob Dole clearly sends a message to the likes of House Speaker Newt Gingrich and Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott — one which demonstrates a unwillingness on the part of the American people to wholeheartedly embrace conservative politics.

Momentum will be on the side of the President, for the meanwhile at least. However, both parties will struggle to define themselves by inauguration time. The Republicans clearly must go back to the drawing boards, while their opponents much devise a way to actually protect entitlement, educational and environmental protection spending within a balanced budget.

Several points of contention are already apparent. Clinton must fulfill his promise to often productive welfare reform if his wishes to keep any semblance of respect within the more liberal and progressive branches of his party.

If the anti–affirmative action Proposition 209 passes in California, Republican lawmakers on Capitol Hill will likely present a similar measure in Congress, reawakening the decades old debate about the role of the Federal government in combating racism. It will no doubt be a sticky situation for Clinton and the Democrats.

On the other side of the aisle, the Republicans must lose their Gingrich base idcological self–righteousness and become the party centered more on economic pragmatism. The financial solvency of Medicare and Social Security are very legitimate issues which require a non–politicized approach.

Whatever party can lead the way in creating a environment where solutions can be made will have a tremendous advantage in the '98 and '00 elections.

Back home, University of Massachusetts students have a lot to be proud of — as their votes certainly played a role in the victory of Clinton, Kerry and Olver, Collegian sources indicate.

Are students therefore, better off now? Saving all the euphoria, support of Clinton, Kerry and Olver were wise moves, based solely on their UMass and higher education record. That vote however, maintains the status–quo, leaving many students to simply make their own conclusions.

■ Clinton wins in landslide, Republicans to hold Congress

By John King
Associated Press

President Clinton won a landslide re-election and political redemption yesterday night as voters brushed aside Bob Dole's challenge to his economic leadership and character. Republicans tempered Clinton's triumph by holding the Senate and the GOP battled to keep the House, too.

Clinton polled strongly in every region for a coast-to-coast victory that made him the first Democratic president re-elected since Franklin Roosevelt. It was a dramatic rebound from the 1994 midterm elections that delivered Congress to the Republicans.

"They have affirmed our cause and told us to go forward," Clinton said of voters who returned him to office. Still, he acknowledged that Americans were bent on splitting the balance of power in Washington. "They are sending us a message: Work together," Clinton said.

Fireworks erupted after the president addressed a crowd of thousands jamming the streets of Little Rock, Ark. Vice President Al Gore called it a "glorious evening" and indeed the numbers were very good for the Democratic ticket. Clinton was on a pace to match if not exceed the 370 electoral votes he won in 1992, and he was close to the majority vote that eluded him in 1992.

"I wish him well and I pledge my support," Dole said in conceding the race, hushing supporters who booed Clinton's name.

Dole and other Republican leaders took solace in returns suggesting that voters would keep the Congress in GOP hands even as they gave Clinton four more years.

"We're going to keep the Senate, we're going to keep the House," Dole said.

It was Dole's last speech as a candidate, ending a remarkable political career that included 35 years in Congress and a record 12 years as the Senate Republican leader. "Tomorrow will be the first time in my life I don't have anything to do," Dole said.

Reform Party candidate Ross Perot was a distant third everywhere and well below the 19 percent he won in 1992. He conceded defeat but was not ready to fade into the shadows. "We going to have to stand at the gate and keep the pressure on and we will," Perot said in Texas, looking ahead perhaps to 2000.

Kerry triumphs over a gracious Weld

By Glen Johnson
Associated Press

BOSTON — After weighing whether to replace their popular U.S. senator with their popular governor, Massachusetts voters decided to stand pat yesterday, re-electing Sen. John Kerry over Republican Gov. William F. Weld.

The incumbent Democrat beat Weld 52 percent to 45 percent with 67 percent of the precincts counted, based on unofficial returns.

Conservative Party candidate Susan Gallagher received 3 percent of the vote.

It was an especially large margin given that polls throughout the campaign showed Weld and Kerry in a statistical dead heat — a race too close to call became just another triumph for a Massachusetts Democrat.

"I was counting on a hidden Weld vote to carry me over the top, but unfortunately the hidden Weld vote remained in hiding," Weld told his supporters in his concession speech.

He said the voters had spoken and "the message is I'm a real good governor and I should stick with that."

Weld also praised Kerry for sticking to his principles, saying:

"He has prevailed in a fair and equal fight if ever there was one."

Kerry, appearing later at a victory party with his Vietnam Swift ' oat crew by his side, reached out to all Massachusetts voters.

"I want to say to those who voted for me and those who didn't vote for me, I heard your voices over the course of this campaign and I learned from all of you," he said.

"I learned more in this campaign about you and about politics and about myself than I have learned in any of my campaigns. I will be a much better senator because of those lessons."

Both men promised to share a beer later, possibly on Thursday, as they had pledged during the campaign.

Weld's campaign manager, Virginia Buckingham, attributed the governor's loss to national rather than local politics.

"I think this is a very big Democratic year, probably the biggest since Watergate. With the governor, I think it's a credit he's in this race so tightly," she said.

The voting followed an epic battle that saw the two bluebloods spend some $15 million and compete in an unprecedented series of debates.

Exit polls showed Kerry ran especially strong among women voters, and that Weld's sometimes harsh campaign rhetoric cost him support. Weld started advertising a month before Kerry and aired commercials accusing Kerry of coddling criminals and supporting drug addicts and alcoholics.

Olver wins; Democrats take Mass. House seats

UM students pack electoral punch

By Joseph Fountain
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts student voters had an easy day at the polls Tuesday, with short lines even with a heavy turnout.

"No problem," said Robert Ripley, graduate student at UMass as he was leaving the polls, when ask to surmise his voting experience.

At 6 p.m., the polls began to flood with students. Election workers helped people to the right voting areas as soon as they entered the building, making the process relatively straight forward.

Student turnout was very high, according to Ken Mosakowski, an election official. Over all, voter turnout was also high, he added.

"I would surprised if we didn't hit 1,000 voters tonight," said Sandra Surner, election warden and resident of Amherst.

Nathan Peyton, associate speaker of the Student Government Association (SGA) at UMass said, "I'm glad to see so many UMass faces voting. I am very happy to see the efforts put forth by student groups especially SCERA (Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy) have been successful and hopefully the trend will continue."

"I appreciate the efforts made by SGA and SCERA to get students out to vote," said Takesha G. Wilson, sophomore psychology major at UMass.

For many students, today was their first time voting.

"This was my first time voting," said Hansg Eugene freshman undeclared major at UMass. "It was easy."

"It's great, I'm excited I got to vote," said Paul Penti, sophomore hotel, restaurant, travel administration major at UMass.

Consistent with the trend of UMass student to register as independents, many said that they were voting for the candidates and not the parties.

"I voted independent and not party, because I think its about who can do the best job in office," said Nathan Wilds, senior sports management major at UMass.

A few people said they voted a straight democratic ticket. "I only vote democrat baby," said an unidentified UMass student.

Outside the polling stations, various campaign workers were holding signs and passing out leaflets.

A contingent from the Mass. Voters For Clean Elections was present in support of question two.

John Swartz a sophomore at the university said, "get money out of politics. It costs $4.4 million to run a successful campaign or you have to raise $14,000 a week for six weeks."

There were not any signs for or against the now approved Question One, a bill that would ban traps and allow non– hunters on the state gaming commission.

"The hunter's shouldn't be able to control the commission or the woods," said Joe Cermiawski, a graduate student at UMass. "Everyone uses the woods and clamp traps should have been banned a 100 years ago."

Initiation marks UM expansion

By T.J. Kelly
Collegian Correspondent

With the slash of a ribbon, the new Governor's Drive was initiated in the northeast section of the University of Massachusetts campus, yesterday.

The unveiling represents the beginning of a major undertaking for university expansion, known as the North Area Plan. Upon completion, the plan will provide modern facilities for the computer science and engineering departments.

The set agenda includes several new buildings over the next 15–20 years, according to Beverly Wood from the Office of Space Management.

"This opening ceremony sets the stage for further development in the technology departments," Wood said. She also added that funding for future academic buildings has been provided by the state.

Private business will finance the development of a proposed office building at a later time.

Construction will begin in the spring, starting with the ground–breaking of a modern computer science lab, where construction site 31 is presently located. Additional sites are already reserved for future projects, including an extension of the engineering department, office space and possibly a parking garage.

"Over the next few years, development will continue as technological institutions replace the area where the old Governor's Drive once existed," said John Matthews, the project manager.

The initiation occurred at the intersection of Governor's Drive and Commonwealth Avenue. New developments will stretch southward from this point.

Slated in the North Area Plan, each building will be three to four stories. Further details on the schedule of construction, which designates assigned times for each new building, begins this spring and continues for 15 to 20 years.

The event was hosted by John Matthews.

In attendance was Student Government Association Senator Sean Marien (OH–Field). "I feel optimistic about the agenda put forward here today. This initial step will lead to great things for our university."

Activist shares thoughts on Habitat 2

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

Libby Hubbard, a human rights activist, presented a slide show and hosted a discussion on human right abuses in Turkey to an audience of 25 on Monday night in the Campus Center.

Hubbard asked Amnesty International, a human rights activists group with a chapter at the University of Massachusetts if she could share her experiences after spending three months over the summer in Istanbul, while attending the Habitat 2 United Nations conference.

The main focus of the conference, she said, was to allow participants to highlight concerns about human rights abuses. For example, Hubbard said that members of the conference were fighting to "push for the UN document on human habitat to have human rights as a component of the document."

She explained that the United States and European nations would not allow homelessness as a violation of human rights, thus preventing it from becoming a major part of the conference platform.

"It's all for an economic reason which is totally unjust and unethical in my opinion," Hubbard said.

She also criticized the globalized nature of the economy and its effects on the poor.

"What it comes down too it that all the homeless people are homeless because of the international banking power and the corruption of economics," she said.

While in Turkey, Hubbard said she witnessed very clearly how American "imperialism" operates, citing the use of English in Turkey as a example.

"English is the dominant language because of its economic power and domination of the American empire," she said.

Many courses at universities in Turkey, she said, are conducted in English which makes communicating non– western ideas with other students difficult.

"If you're studying political science and getting all your concepts in English, it is very difficult to even begin to dialogue about the police/state problems," Hubbard said.

"Education is divorced from what reality is — it's virtual education so you can't connect and you can't really live," she added.

However, Hubbard said that she became unhappy with the conference because it was not meeting her expectations.

"I started not liking the conference very much because it wasn't radical enough for me. It wasn't addressing the problems that needed to be solved in civilization. No one was looking at the root fundamental problems," she said.

Hubbard, however, located a alternative conference on the Internet. Unfortunately for Hubbard, she became ill and was not able to participate to the extent she had wished.

Because of the radical nature of the conference, several participants were arrested, including a friend of Hubbard's from the University of Bosphorus.

Upset, Hubbard said she worked to pressure the government for the release of her friend by writing a essay entitled "The Liberation of Habitat 2," and distributed it amongst the Turkish press.

"I got too involved. I said forget the panels I don't care about the forum. I want to try to become a human rights worker right here because this is the problem with civilization," she said.

The press, however, was not so welcoming to Hubbard's views.

"The problem was that newspapers there are kind of like newspapers here, but even worse. They are more like gossip papers and they rarely tell the truth. So the papers made it sound like I was just in Turkey looking for love, that I wasn't there to speak out for human rights," she said.

Maureen Sheehan, group coordinator at Amnesty International said, "I didn't agree with everything that Hubbard said but I do agree that we need to end human rights abuse."

Kevin Sexton, a senior engineering major, said he found himself questioning many of her views but also found her speech educational.

"It was interesting but idealistic. There was a lot of theory but no practice," he said.

Following the slide show and presentation, Amnesty held a letter writing campaign. Audience members wrote letters to the Turkish government to help bring justice to the region.

Sheehan said that out of the 44,000 cases that students have written letters about, 43,000 have been resolved.

Amnesty International will be holding a letter writing campaign on Nov. 19 in room 165–164 in the Campus Center. Call 545–1925 for more information.

Student calls for rally support

The following is a speech by Pierre Elysee at last Friday's rally in front of the Student Union

To those who could not attend the rally

On Friday, Oct. 4, I was falsely accused of stealing at the University Store. After undertaking a private investigation I realized that I was a prime suspect whenever I walked in the University Store. Joined by fellow students on the 18th of October, I organized a rally in front of the store to protest the racial incident. My goal was to expose the incident to the campus community in order to prevent it from happening again. Today we are having another rally for two reasons: To publicly respond to Ms. Elizabeth Dale (Director of Campus Center Administration) and to protest with the way the Daily Collegian has been dealing with the whole issue.

In an article appearing in the Collegian last week, Ms. Elizabeth Dale stated that the store has lost more that $1,000 worth of merchandise since the beginning of the semester. I was told that same fact when I was originally (falsely) accused. This is her concern. It is neither mine, nor yours. I was not supposed to be, nor was anyone else, in a situation to be humiliated and degraded by fellow students here at the University of Massachusetts. The reason it happens is because those who are responsible for the store make use of their state of mind instead of their logic. For example, there is no need for two security students to be on a person of color any time he or she walks in the store. No wonder they cannot catch most of the stealers. Another approach, suggested by a fellow student, was to hire more students. They would stand in each aisle with uniforms that identified them as security. What about using scanners that be easily purchased from the benefit made from over pricing items?

Also in that letter, Ms. Elizabeth Dale failed to explain to us why out of 300 employees working at the store she claimed 25 are minorities, which is less that ten percent. Keep in mind that this low representation of minority students working in the store is happening at a time when some are trying to prove that Affirmative Action has been unfair to them. With Affirmative Action in vigor, the store has successfully hired less than ten percent of us. A fair question to ask is: How many of us would get a job at this university? And the result of this inquiry should be made public as soon as possible.

Ms. Elizabeth Dale continued to say that at the training received by the security students, they were told to target people looking for cameras. However, she failed to give us a valid reason why among all of those highly talented students recruited to have this training there was no minority at all. Perhaps Affirmative Action has already been abolished in the security department.

Now let's change gears, to focus on the unacceptable handling of the incident by the Collegian. To my surprise, as well as to my friends' who contributed to the success of the first rally, we were not qualified to make the Collegian front page. Meanwhile, five other rallies following ours made the front page. When I asked why it was the case, I was told that no pictures were taken that day. Since this was considered as a "Black Affair," what about a highlight from the front page to lead readers to the Black Affairs? Instead of a response, I received an explanation justifying that a similar rally took place at Smith College was on the Collegian front page in order to link the two rallies. A source at the Collegian claimed that it could not be supported since there was no sentence from the article regarding the Smith rally that could link the rallies.

On the other hand, we were surprised to read in the Collegian, a copy of my letter describing the incident 11 days after it was submitted. In the meantime, the Collegian published a letter of apology five days after the rally, from the administration. That letter was meaningless to those who were deprived of the right to read my letter explaining the treatment and humiliation I was subject to at first. Is not basic journalism supposed to expose the incident to the public prior to any follow up? Because of that mishandling from the Collegian, I would encourage you all to show them your unhappiness by not reading the newspaper this coming Monday. As for the University Store, I will leave it up to you to decide.

Showing up in mass today is evidence of our willingness and determination that as long as racism persists on the UMass campus so will we. In this crowd, I can easily identify people from all racial backgrounds. I would like to thank you all, especially that white students for their support in fighting a common enemy "Racism."

I would like to finish by reading a poem entitled: "Why Is It So Dark?"

Why is it so dark
Another day in the darkness
Another day without sunlight
No sound no color no shape

A step forward, a step backward, left right
Panic confusion

Afraid of taking the wrong step
Afraid of making the wrong choice
Why don't we cry, why don't we scream for help

Afraid of the echo of our voices
Afraid of being betrayed once again

One final option left
Standing up for our beliefs
Joining the fight in a spirit of brotherhood in order to achieve a common precious goal
Which is unity and understanding among us all
Until then we are not going to rest. And we cannot rest.

We must guarantee that the sun will shine again for generations that come after us. Once again I would like to thank you all for showing support and understanding in a crucial time in my life. Remember divided we are vulnerable but together we are invincible and represent the real power.

Thank you all,

In 1920, a 46-year-old engineer named Frank Conrad, an employee of Westinghouse Corporation, built a small radio transmitter through which he and his family broadcast music on evenings and weekends. Word of the transmitter quickly reached the vice-president of Westinghouse. He asked Conrad if he could build his transmitter to broadcast the results of the 1920 presidential election.

Later that year, in Pittsburgh, the era of the radio was ushered in by the radio broadcast of Warren. G. Harding's victory in the presidential election. The broadcast was heard in 1000 homes in the Pittsburgh area.

With radio broadcasting still in its infant stages, a new method of disseminating information was invented. At the 1939 World's Fair, the television made its debut onto the world's stage. Both modes of broadcasting gained enormous popularity and quickly grew into the countless number of radio stations and ever-increasing numbers of television stations that exist today.

These new television stations and media outlets are pawns in a disturbing game that will leave the public with a limited number of avenues to access information. The present condition of mass-media in the United States is one in which a handful of corporations own the majority of media outlets. These corporations include General Electric, Time Warner, Disney/Capital Cities and Westinghouse. These mega-media corporations have come into existence mainly because of the deregulation of the communications industry in the late '80s. For example, in 1987 the Fairness Doctrine, adopted by the Federal Communications Commission in 1949, was abolished because the doctrine, the FCC argued, unconstitutionally restricted freedom of speech. In reality, the doctrine would have created an open media that would allow for differing opinions by requiring broadcasters to devote time to discuss issues in the public interest.

In 1934, Congress passed a Communications Act that created a system of privately owned broadcasting stations that would in theory serve the public interest. Unfortunately, today's media juggernauts look out for themselves more than they look out for the welfare of the public. Corporations such as General Electric and Westinghouse may not permit NBC and CBS to air a report about faulty GE aircraft engines and improper waste disposal by Westinghouse's Redemption Services Group, respectively.

The current situation in broadcast media will increase the divide between groups who have and do not have access to information. People are tricked into believing that news is coming to them unfiltered, but in reality it is contaminated by the poisons of corporate ownership. Recently, Australian- born print and fledgling broadcast Goliath, Rupert Murdoch unveiled his answer to CNN's monopoly of a cable all-news channel. He created the FOX channel that has the slogan "we give you the facts, you decide." Despite this idealistic slogan of today's media, it points the way to how future media should conduct itself. Corporathons should follow the slogan and let the public know whose hands are controlling what media organization. Then the public can decide whether an NBC report on defense contractors is credible when GE is one of the contractors.

Following the "me" decade of the '80s, these corporations have made the logical progression into their dealings with the media. They have continued to be motivated by profit margins rather than the general well-being of the public to whom they are providing "un-biased" information. This drive for increased profits has been brought to the public by your friendly neighborhood stock holders. The "corporate merger" has become a staple of American life in the '80s and into the '90s. This trend is painfully clear in movies like Michael J. Fox's "Secret of My Success" and the real life merger between Time-Warner and Turner Broadcasting.

These mergers between corporations, that seem at the surface to have no impact on the media, have been made possible by the members of the corporation for favoritism to corporations, the United States government. In the early '80s, the government continued its deregulation of the communications industry by allowing a corporation to own more than 12 stations and abolished the 16 minute period for commercials per hour of broadcasting. This deregulation paved the way for mega-corporations such as Disney, Capital Cities and the American Broadcasting Corporation to unite. This alliance commands State Farm Insurance, the Fort-Worth Star Telegram of Texas, television stations covering 24.5 percent of households, the ABC Network News and the home of Scrooge McDuck and the Magic Kingdom, Disney World.

When these alliances are exposed to the public, people will be left scratching their heads wondering how their government could have let this happen; a nation where the information the public receives is not reality, but the reality of a defense contractor, a colossal book publisher or a home insurance giant. The public will be left wondering what happened to the Sherman Anti-Trust Act they learned about in the fifth grade. If we don't stop mega-mergers between corporations and media organizations soon, we will lose our ability to address our concerns through an unbiased media. If we don't, the country will develop a severe case of social laryngitis.

Surfing with a foot in a mouth

Seema Gangatirkar

The election is over.

And thankfully, Bill Clinton and Ross Perot managed not to say anything too terribly stupid.

This time around, Perot lost the paranoia bit. No allegations of Republicans messing around with his daughter's wedding. The key element of his attempt to make the White House his new address was that he didn't say anything nuts. In contrast, Clinton had it much easier. Basically, he just had to sit there and look pretty, and maybe feel your pain every now and then. Even the Dick Morris affair couldn't put a dent in his lead. What it came down to is Clinton didn't have to say a word.

Bob Dole, on the other hand, couldn't seem to help himself. All too often, he appeared to want to help Clinton win the election. First there was Dole's inability to recognize himself as an individual. Consistently, he would refer to himself in the third person. For any of you who missed this fine piece of rhetoric, here's an example: "Bob Dole is the right man for the job. He knows what needs to be done."

At the end of the first debate, Dole made a passionate appeal to the young people of America, telling them to ignore the temptations of drugs. He concluded his speech by implying that he, Bob Dole, understood what the youth of today was going through.

It seems to me that Dole is probably a good guy. He'd probably make great golfing buddies with John Major and Boris Yeltsin. Liddy would have made a great first lady — you'd never catch her swimming in white water.

So what went wrong? Other than the obvious reason — Dole is on the wrong side of youth — he couldn't keep his mouth shut.

Unfortunately, Dole caught the bug that his opponents successfully managed to avoid: he was afflicted with a chronic case of foot-in-mouthitis.

You know this disease. It happens to the best of us. You know, when you say something stupid and you know you're saying something stupid, but unfortunately for you, the words are already out there. And once those words are out there, it's really hard to cram them back down your throat.

Especially if you say something completely embarrassing. There's that long silence, where everyone looks at everyone else, and there's a bit of twitching. Finally, someone makes an attempt to rectify the situation, to explain what you really meant. Chances are, if you've said something completely whacked, it doesn't make sense to trust your future to words again.

It's at this point that the disease strikes most painfully. Open mouth, insert foot, swallow hard.

Fortunately, for most of us, we don't say stupid things in front of the whole world. Unless we said something completely ruinous, the whole thing is usually forgotten with a span of minutes.

Politicians don't have that luxury. Every little sound bite is recorded, jotted down, committed to memory. Somewhere, someone is keeping a running tally of all the dumb things said by politicians through the ages, so Dole is in good company.

He only has to look at fellow Republican, Dan Quayle, for a shiny, sparkling example of foot-in-mouthitis.

Among some of Quayle's choicer tidbits: he once said that he wished he studied more Latin in high school so that when he visited Latin America, he could have spoken to the inhabitants.

Even President Kennedy, great orator that he was, couldn't avoid calling himself a jelly doughnut in front of thousands when he visited Berlin.

You got to feel bad for Bob Dole. He really wanted to win and some of the things he said were more out of desperation than anything else. At this point, he'll probably retire and try to avoid speaking. But if you miss the old guy, you can always take him up on his invitation: "Visit my website."

Identity Crisis

Jeremy Hurewitz

I woke up this morning and couldn't feel my legs. That's how I know it's gonna be a bad hangover. This weekend has taken its toll. Parties have left me with a weaker liver and more contempt for humanity.

Who am I fooling thinking I could be a writer or a musician? What was I thinking hoping to have novels in quiet, tomb-like libraries next to Hemingway and Steinbeck or important CD's on store racks with Robert Johnson and the Beatles? I'm nothing but a half-talent and it's a longshot that I even make a ripple in the lake of life.

My friends sum me up well. One said "Jeremy, you're Homer Simpson with more intellect." Another said, "You're always one of four things: drunk, hungover, reading or sleeping." I'm really just an absurd jester who watches too much "Beavis and Butthead." This isn't working, I have to change.

I could change my major to accounting and join a fraternity like my mother wanted me to. I could meet a nice Jewish girl from Long Island and we could be boyfriend and girlfriend. We could aspire to that heralded American dream of success and aggrandizement. I'd work in Manhattan and my wife could teach. We'd have two blond children, a boy and a girl, with dimples and darling smiles. Pretty soon I'll be promoted and I'll buy that sports car I always wanted and buy my wife a fur coat or some jewels. I could buy a lovely little ski house, filled with antiques and done up in trendy après-ski design.

I could have my old fraternity buddies up for a visit and sit by the fire and toast our glasses of cognac. After a hard day on the slopes the last thing on my mind will be that beating I took from an old roommate or the time I got busted in New York City for drugs...

I could go to L.A. and get into the porn business. Get paid to lay it into silicone breasted Amazon queens at exotic locations. I'd wear funny sunglasses, work out all the time and change my name to something like Jack Indabox. Eventually I could get into direction and production. I'll run Ron Jeremy right out of town.

I could indulge this post-adolescent idealistic phase and quit college and move to Paris. I'd sit in cafés by the Seine reading Nietzsche, smoking cigarettes, drinking coffee, stroking my goatee and looking real tormented. I'd congregate with my fellow expatriates and form an elite clique of pretentious snobs. We'd smoke more cigarettes, drink more coffee, discuss whether Kierkegaard was really the founder of Existentialism and bitch about our parents whose money we'd be quickly consuming.

I could get a job as a night caretaker at a graveyard. I'd have a run-down shack at the edge of it and always have a bottle of bourbon nearby. I'd wear overalls, let my hair grow all ragged, let my teeth rot and stop bathing. I'd tell scary stories to folks visiting their dead relatives and cackle maniacally as they shuffle away from me. I'd scare little children, "Hey! Do you kids want to see my funny finger? He He He Ha Ha Ha!"

I could become a stalker. I'd stalk Demi Moore and loath that bastard Bruce Willis. At first I'd just follow her around when she was home or on a movie set. Then I'd get her autograph and appear unstable as I praised her talents. I'd repeat this a few times until she knew to avoid me. Then I'd break into her house and she'd come home and I'd be sitting on her bed with a pair of her panties on my head. Then, I'd attack her with a lunatic's vengeance and Bruce would storm in and save the day and give me a thrashing I'd never forget. The police and media would arrive in force and take me away. I'd go to jail and write a book about the stalking that would sell millions of copies and make some fat, old, bald man richer as my cell mate Bubba rapes me and calls me his love slave.

I could accept Christ into my life and become a born-again Christian. My eyes would glow with a new-found salvation and I'd transfer to Bible College. I'd lose all my friends as I push Christ on them relentlessly, but that would be OK because they'd all be lost anyway. I'd develop a messianic complex and gather followers. I'd ramble on about snakes, demons, hail and brimstone and how I am your only chance for salvation.

The C.I.A. would start a file on me and put me on a top secret watch list. "Hard Copy" would do a sensationalized story on me with exclusive pictures of our compound at a remote location in Idaho. I'd arm my people for the Armageddon as my paranoid delusions exacerbate. Then, just like that, I'd be assassinated as I went for a doughnut in the nearest town. Everyone will applaud and celebrate my death and say I was an evil man.

My followers would tell stories about me brain-washing them and break down in tears. Some muck-raking Australian would exaggerate all the details of the story in a best-selling book and get rich and fat.

Wait... there's a knock on my door. I tell them to come in.

"Hey Jeremy, lets get drunk and break stuff."

"Cool."

Oh, wait, what was I saying? Whatever, life won't wait and the best you can do is just be yourself and let the chips fall where they may. I gotta go.

Rubbing elbows with the big guys

Although I caught him as he was barreling by me, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts' senior senator could not have been happier to see me last week outside the Cape Cod Lounge minutes before the Democratic forum began.

"Sen. Kennedy," I said with a broad grin while we gripped right hands as he continued to blow by me. "It is wonderful that you've come to the University of Massachusetts!"

Similarly and by no means surprisingly, our junior senator, whose vigorous and passionate campaign culminated election day — yesterday, was also diplomatic when greeted.

"Thank you very much for coming to the University of Massachusetts, Sen. Kerry," I said at the end of the forum as large smiles embellished our faces.

The Massachusetts Congressman present at the forum (who unbeknownst to me was a former professor here) repeated exactly what I said to him while I was smiling, as he looked into my eyes with a stern and slightly patronizing expression. And then he elaborated, while continuing to stare at me.

"Welcome to the University of Massachusetts," I said to U.S. Rep. John Olver as we shook hands.

Ever the astute politico, UMass Chancellor David K. Scott was also present, as he perfectly situated himself alongside prominent individuals visiting the University he leads and carries.

With the exception of Olver (about whom I had never heard), I have previously met each of the aforementioned individuals.

While in Washington, D.C. late last spring, a good-sized selection of UMass students successfully lobbied Sens. Kerry and Kennedy, as they both assured us of their unwavering support for the Foreign Aid Bill.

But I did not expect either of the two to remember me, considering that this encounter was merely an acquaintance, in that word's most remote definition.

From across the lounge at the forum, I waved and genuinely smiled to the Chancellor, but he unfortunately never noticed, although I believe our eyes connected. He and I met weekly for half an hour in his Whitmore office during Spring semester 1995 to discuss campus politics.

In order to gain the Chancellor's respect, I always got decked out in a shirt and tie on days we met in efforts to convey an even more positive portrayal of the Collegian.

I would listen so closely to the Chancellor that my friends commented that I picked up his accent. At one time I could do a reasonably respectable impersonation.

Many authorities on campus often discussed with me the Chancellor's policies, and regardless of whether they provided a positive or negative spin, I had the chance to hear for myself what he had to say, and make my own decision.

On different occasions I also had the opportunity to go to the Chancellor's Hillside home and attend catered dinner parties paid for by the students.

By the way, belated thanks to those who footed the bill.

However, now that I write only a weekly column and not front-page news, I do not have the same access to the Chancellor that I once had. Neither do I pursue the same access that he once allowed.

Nor do I desire the same privilege that the Chancellor encouraged.

But, I enjoyed rubbing shoulders with this campus' highest-ranking administrator because I saw and discovered, from the point-man, how this University operates.

Additionally, the Chancellor further imparted to me a respect I have always held for authority figures, regardless of how blurred the ideas boundaries are. And, that semester, I also became more aware of people's methods of politically-savvy interaction.

Which perhaps is why the Democrat who stumbled upon our campus were entertaining, although in some cases they could not spare the time.

Former Professor Olver maintained that stern and slightly intimidating expression after I greeted him.

"Welcome to the University of Massachusetts," Congressman Olver said. "Huh. That's an interesting point."

After the forum ended and others disappeared, Sen. Kerry stayed on stage, where he posed for pictures and continued to schmooze, allowing for interested participants to approach him.

"Thank you," Sen. Kerry responded after I gave him a nod. "It's wonderful to be here."

A large throng of enthusiasts were following the senior Senator as we approached each other in the hall, and I wanted to say anything, just to see what sort of response I would evoke.

"Thank you," Sen. Kennedy answered without stopping his stride as he passed me by and wrangled his hand free. "It's great to see you."

The friendly folks at Texaco

Sam Mc Afee

There is an environmental crisis occurring in Ecuador today. The heavily debt-burdened Latin American country, in an attempt to save its dying economy, has increased oil drilling in the Amazon River basin. The environmental damage resulting from drilling conducted by Texaco over the last 30 years promises to worsen as the Ecuadorian government prepares to open more of its portion of the Amazonian region to other transnational energy companies. There has been fierce opposition from both US-based environmental groups and local indigenous organizations but not without conflict between the two.

Like most Latin American countries, Ecuador has an export-oriented economy reminiscent of colonial times and is heavily in debt to development agencies like the World Bank. In 1964, the Ecuadorian government, then a military regime, signed a 20 year contract with Texaco, granting the corporation exclusive rights to the country's oil reserves. Texaco would give the government a whopping seven percent of the profits to be used to pay off the massive debt. Texaco constructed a pipeline to pump oil from deep in the rainforest out to the coastal harbors where tankers wait to ship it to the US and Europe.

The oil drilling has had a disastrous effect on the environment and on the indigenous people who depend on it for their survival. "Some 330 oil wells and pumping stations have punctured the jungle floor, to lap up a billion-and-a-half barrels of crude, while hundreds of miles of roads, ducts, and pipelines have ripped through the lush vegetation," wrote Marc Cooper in his article, "Rain Forest Crude." The prospecting has had a negative effect both by directly spoiling the environment through contamination and by encouraging further settlement in the area by poor "colonists" seeking economic prosperity, leading to "the clearing of two million acres of rainforest," wrote Glenn Switkes, another authority.

The indigenous people of the region have been hit the hardest by the oil industry. All too often native villages are transformed into refinery towns, and the villagers are either driven away or poisoned by the side effects of the drilling.

An account in Switkes' article, "The People vs. Texaco," states that, "Rivers and streams upon which indigenous people depended for fish turned black with oil. Once abundant game were frightened away by explosions used in oil prospecting, or were hunted to extinction by oil workers and settlers. Indigenous women were forced into prostitution, and children suffered from diseases unknown before oil was found on their lands."

There has been a reaction to all this by both local indigenous groups, like the Confederation of Indian Nationalities of the Ecuadorian Amazon (CONFENIAE), and by more moderate US-based environmental groups, like the National Resources Defense Council (NRDC). The indigenous groups are frustrated by the prominent U.S. presence on all sides of the issue. The problem results from a U.S. company selling oil to the United States to pay off a debt owed to U.S. banks, and if that were not enough, U.S. environmental groups, trained in the art of compromise have involved themselves in the conflict.

There is much resentment on the part of the indigenous people stemming from "the historical mistrust that many Indian groups feel for environmentalists, whom they often associate with the most conservative, oligarchic conservationists in the country," according to Cooper. The main difference between the two seems to be the environmentalists' willingness to allow drilling in exchange for monetary concessions. The indigenous groups, who have seen there homelands destroyed, find this unacceptable, and prefer immediate halting of the drilling and subsequent thorough clean-up of the area.

The oil drilling continues at an accelerated pace, as profit- fattened Texaco prepares to pull out and Maxus Energy, Oryx and others move in to fill the gap. As conditions worsen, radical ecology groups like Greenpeace and Earth First! are expected to join indigenous organizations in efforts to block further drilling with acts of civil disobedience. It is too early to tell how effective this will be, however, it is likely, if the protesters are not promptly given international support, there will be no more forest to protect.

How do I work this thing?

Pasqual Marigold

It all started when we were talking about commercials. I was on the phone with Mark, one of the guys I shared a house with when I lived at the Cape. It was Wednesday night. You're probably thinking to yourself that I must be really pathetic since I know what night it was. You are sadly mistaken. Mark is the one who is really pathetic because I could hear the theme song of "90210" in the background.

"Mark, is that "90210?" Are you actually watching that show? Oh man, I am so disappointed in you."

"Calm yourself. It's just on. I'm not really watching it... Damn! I hate these commercials. I mean, do tampon commercials have to be so in depth?"

"They have to. Otherwise, that, I believe, they didn't then people wouldn't be aware of the product."

"No, not that. That's fine. Flash the tampon on the screen. Whoooee! A new, smoother applicator — rock on. But don't show me how once it gets there it expands to fit you. I have no desire to know about insertion or expansion. Uh, wait..."

So, this conversation could have gone two ways: A) we could have started talking about sex — BAAN-CHICKA-BAAN-BAAN! (which happens to be my phonetic version of typical porno music, or so I've heard); or B) we could've kept chatting right on the tampon trip. And tampons it was. I randomly started telling Mark about my first experience with a tampon and how I had no clue what to do. I had NO directions, none. Mark was completely appalled that tampons didn't come with directions because they're certainly not self-explanatory, at least not to me as a 12 year old.

(Just a little aside — until recently I had no clue that tampons didn't come with directions. When I was on the phone, I sat there and read out most of the writing on the box — no directions. Apparently the directions are on an enclosed pamphlet inside the box, along with warnings on toxic shock syndrome. I usually throw that stuff out, so it was my own fault. They ought to consider putting directions on the individual wrapper. But I digress.)

So this idea sent us all around our houses (luckily we both have cordless phones) looking at all the things that do have directions and the things that don't. At this point in time, tampons were what the category of "we're not telling you how to use this."

The thing is, pretty much everything has directions: hair products, household cleaning agents (and don't you know my roommate became a bathroom cleaner that you spray on the shower doors daily to get it clean. A no-scrub deal, right? Well, guess what? The directions say that you will see result in two weeks. I'm sorry, two weeks. That's awfully long to wait for a clean bathroom), appliances, and food. However, hygiene products tend to refrain from directions. Okay, so we know that tampons have directions, wonderful. But toothbrushes don't. And really, I don't remember where I learned how to brush my teeth. Maybe I haven't been doing it correctly all these years and would benefit greatly from having directions. Alright, not really, but of all the things that have directions, I would think that toothbrushes should fall under that category. Same thing with my disposable razors — no directions. Hmmm... so they'll tell you how to open your beer ("twist off") but not how to use a sharp and potentially dangerous razor. Moral: Drink more beer, don't shave.

Really though, Mark and I had a blast running around our houses and searching for directions. Sometimes even the simplest directions get ignored. Sort of like when you have a milk carton and it says "open here" but you open it on the other side. "Damn, I hate it when I do that. Stupid stupid stupid." What ended up happening was that Mark and I had a competition on who could find the most asinine directions. Mark won with the potpourri spray in his bathroom. "Aim and spray. Ha! Suck it up, Marigold. You can't beat that."

When your food smiles back at you

Eliza Berkowitz

Have you ever gotten that not-so-fresh feeling? You know which one I mean. The gut wrenching, intestine bursting, colon disrupting feeling you get after eating in the Dining Commons is not too pleasant. Anyone who has ever eaten in the D.C. has experienced the D.C. hangover. It sucks.

Your intentions were good. You simply wanted to eat a good, hearty meal and replenish your body's fuel supply, but the results are far worse than starvation. You get sleepy. You feel like a bulldozer is wreaking havoc on your digestive system.

Your body is not happy. It's your own fault. You do this to yourself every day. I hope you are aware that this could have been avoided. How, you ask? The answer is simple. Follow these simple guidelines and you'll be D.C. hangover- free forever.

Never eat anything that talks to you. I once made the mistake of eating a chicken fajita that tried to give me study tips. I explained to Mr. Chicken Fajita that if he didn't shut up, I was going to eat him. He didn't shut up, so I ate him. Big mistake.

I felt like feces for hours. I guess it was a learning experience, though. I haven't touched any talking food since. The other day when Mr. Stone Willy began giving me fashion tips, I placed a napkin over him and threw him away. It just ain't worth it, you know?

Stay away from recycled food. Seriously, though. Do they ever change those rotating hot dogs or do they just use the same ones day after day? I wonder about those things sometimes. Every day I see these poor hot dogs rotating around and around, but I've never seen anyone eat one. I've heard that the buns are really good for making fluffer-nutter sandwiches, but I don't think there's any good use for the frankfurters. They're definitely not fit for human consumption. I wonder if the ducks in the pond like hot dogs...

Don't eat the food that tries to escape from your tray. The last time my Duchess Meat Pie tried to roll off my plate, I declared war and chopped him up into a hundred million little pieces and threw him in the garbage can where he belongs. Come on now, folks. I thought it was common knowledge that if food is cooked properly, it's not supposed to move. I actually saw some girl chase her Chicken Kiev through Franklin. When she finally caught him she had worked up such an appetite that she ate him. Stupid girl. Not only are the floors not fit to eat off of in Franklin, but she had to chase her food in order to eat it. Duh, food isn't supposed to move.

Don't eat anything that makes strange noises. If your Chicken Cordon Bleu clucks at you, put it down. If your Cheeseburger moos at you, put it aside. These should not be normal occurrences in any kind of eating establishment, but in our Dining Commons, there are no normal occurrences.

Stay away from seafood in the D.C. Seafood is pretty scary in normal eating establishments, but in a place where they serve grade D meat, the fish just simply cannot be safe. A big plateful of fried shrimp may sound appetizing, but your body just will not thank you afterwards. I wouldn't feed that crap to my cat. (If I had a cat.) I have two words for you: food poisoning.

Okay, so now you're left wondering what you can eat in the Dining Commons, right? I would advise not eating anything that was cooked, cut up, boiled, shredded, touched or looked at by any D.C. worker, but that would be kind of impossible. The salad is safe. The cereal seems pretty harmless, too. The bread products don't really pose any threat, either. Just remember that they can and will add MSG to anything that they can. You would think that UMass has stock in the company that manufactures MSG because they use so much of it.

One more thing: the next time your food bites you, do yourself a favor. Don't bite back.

Social Insecurity

Erika Matthews

Driving home on Route nine a few weekends ago, I noticed an elderly couple standing on the side of the road with a sign that read in bright, bold lettering, "Vote for Kerry. Save Medicare."

I sharply looked away, but the image burned into me. For a program that costs $159 billion a year, Medicare hardly seems on the verge of extinction. In another five years, the numbers are projected to run up to $288 billion. And to think: Congress once estimated that Medicare would cost no more than $8 billion a year by 1990.

I recently read in an article that ran the length of my spine like a Stephen King novel. Entitled, Who Will Face the Music? and written by Elizabeth Kolbert, it outlined the crushing burdens of Social Security and Medicare and how today's 20 somethings are being doomed to carrying the weight of a system they'll surely never benefit from.

Picture this: In 1950, there were 100 workers for every six recipients. By the year 2030, for every 100 workers, there will be 43 recipients. What changed? For starters, the baby boom of yesteryear was replaced with the current baby bust; fewer children being born today means less workers to support beneficiaries tomorrow. Another crucial part of the equation: people are living longer than ever, which means they stay on Social Security and Medicare longer than anticipated decades ago. Add to that the rise in cost of living and stagnated wages and you have a system that's sure to collapse under its own weight.

The article also challenges the myth that retirees are simply collecting money that they put into Social Security during their employment ears. According to the latest calculations by economists at the Urban Institute, many senior citizens have received enough benefits above what they paid into the system to purchase a house and a car and still have something left over.

Excluding payments on the national debt, spending on the elderly now accounts for approximately half of the Federal domestic budget. The cruel irony is that while the young are the ones expected to foot the bill, they are also the ones most likely to be poor. Today, 12 percent of the elderly are considered poor, compared with 20 percent of American children.

The politicians in Washington are doing little more than playing with numbers. Frankly put, they're buying time with money that's costing future generations at exponential rates. Social Security is doomed to go bankrupt unless drastic changes are made within the next few years, but political parties are playing on voters' fears to protect their own agendas. When the Republicans focused on balancing the budget earlier in their campaign, the Democratic party saw this as an opportunity to say that their opponents were after cutting benefits to the elderly.

Of course this immediately caused an uproar, and the Republicans backpeddled right out of the issue.

I vote without fail, but I also suffer from political defeatism on this one. The plain fact is that our generation has no retirement found in Washington. What we're putting in now in taxes we will never see. It's a fact that's as sure as death and well, taxes.

Social Security, even at its most optimistic pinnacle, was never meant to be relied on as the sole source of income for retirees. Its original purpose was to serve as a supplement for what people's investments and savings didn't cover. People see Social Security as an entitlement for what they put in during their employment years. Under the current economic and demographic circumstances, it's a philosophy that's sure to cost future generations at staggering rates.

As a generation, one of our best defenses is to vote. But beyond that, we have to take control of our own financial futures. We have to. Before the ink dries on your college diploma, set up a deferred compensation plan. Just $5 a week set aside can make a dramatic difference in the long run. If you can, invest in real estate. And if you don't know where to start, consult with someone who does.

This is not an emotional issue. This is not a blame issue. This is not about generational wedges. This is mainly an issue of numbers, facts and common sense. Most importantly, it's an issue that's staring our generation right in the face. We have to have the foresight to look back.

To be... or not to be

Luis Guerra

As much as I would like to, I can't lie to the three people who are going to read this article. At first I was going to write an article about the disappearance of real gentlemen, but several important events happened to me in between the thinking of the article and the actual writing of it made me change my point of view.

Before these events, I thought that a lot (notice the "lot," no "all," you letter to the editor-writing lovers!) of people in the United States (I'm a Mexican, on an exchange program) were losing the art of being gentlemen, you know, opening doors for women, not letting them walk on the side of the street when walking on the sidewalk, giving them your seat, that stuff that most people have heard of or remember, but little else.

Then there was the one unforgettable event that started to make me change my point of view on this subject. I was on a trip to Boston when my point of view on this subject changed. My friends and I had just gotten in the subway, and I rapidly looked for a seat. When I was just sitting, an American girl that was with us came and stood in front of me. I rapidly stood up offering her my seat, but she did not accept it even when I told her that I was not going to sit down no matter what (that made me mad, it's supposed to work!)

And then she said what I feel was most important about the event — "You are not in Mexico anymore." WHAM!! It struck me hard (besides I felt like Dorothy), but it was true, I wasn't. So, should that matter? I don't know if it should, but it does.

That made me very observant of my surroundings as to men and women go. I watched them very closely trying to discover what it was that made this country different, and I did. Maybe it's not the only thing that makes the difference, but it does. What separates the United States is women, yes, women.

Back home (and in many countries — don't get mad at just Mexico), women expect men to open doors for them and sometimes become surprised if they find themselves walking on the side of the street or a sidewalk while with a man. Some may even make you get up (it has happened, honest!) when they can't find a seat. Here, on the contrary, girls sometimes open the doors for men, don't even see anything wrong on walking on the side of the street, and almost never expect, and as you could notice almost never accept, a seat given to them.

So, is it all women's fault? Well, not exactly (wait, I'll make up my mind soon). Let me explain this. A girl you are with opens the door for you. Although you don't really notice it, you notice it. Because the next time, if she is going in front of you and there is a door, then you "unconsciously" expect her to open it again, simply because she's closer to it. So she gets the idea that she is, not supposed to of course, but as "equally expected" to open the door as the guy is.

Another matter that gets in the way of both male and female relations is feminism. As a guy, you may think that the girl will take the gentleman's manners in a macho way. As a girl, you may think that by opening the doors you are not letting women have their own way (whatever that means).

Don't take this as a comparison between manners in different countries. I'm not saying that it's better in other countries, just plain different. I have now come to accept it, there is nothing wrong in not being a real gentleman in the United States (maybe being just a mild gentleman is enough). And believe me, I will follow what I preach.

So my point is, girls, if the stuff I've said in this article is nothing but a bunch of lies, and you do want guys to be gentlemen with you, don't bother writing to the editor (although you are very free to do so). If you want guys to be gentlemen just make that big stop before doors if you want them to be opened for you. Then make that "I'll kill you if you don't" stare when you want them to give you a seat. If necessary, simply tell them, "I want you to be a gentleman." By doing so, you'll save us a lot of time and confusion. And guys, until you see the signs, just be yourself, whatever that is, and if you are seeing them now, well, your life couldn't be any easier.

Raising cash for the martial arts

Students of "Safe and Sound with me around," self-defense program at Valley Women's Martial Arts co-sponsored by the Western Mass. Girl Scouts.

Valley Women's Martial Arts, Inc. (VWMA), a non-profit school and community service organization for women and children will hold an arts and services auction to raise money for student scholarships.

The event, which has taken place throughout the past 10 years, will be held on Sat. at the Northampton Unitarian Society, Main St., Northampton. In addition to the auction and works of art donated by members of the community, demonstrations of martial arts and self defense will be performed by instructors of students of VWMA.

In between the auction there will be demonstrations showing basic and advanced martial arts, practical self- defense, verbal techniques and releases from grabs. Head instructor and one of the founding members of VWMA Janet Aalfs said it will "definitely be a party atmosphere, we make it a fun event."

Valley Women's Martial Arts is committed to eradicating violence and abuse, and teaches self-defense, karate and modern arnis to women and children. According to Aalfs, martial arts is a positive activity for women and children because when fear is verbalized it enables us to "find out the strengths we have, but might not know about."

The school offers self-defense workshops that "are focused on empowerment and safety strategies, not so much on lecturing, but involving people in exercises," said Aalfs. Through martial arts women can apply their instincts to every day activities, according to Aalfs and "increase confidence and self esteem."

"When I am afraid I have an idea of what to do with the energy. Move through fear and continue to take action," Aalfs said.

Workshops offered at VWMA include a free introductory self-defense workshop for women and girls ages 12 and up. This workshop is designed for those with little or no formal self defense training as well as for those who wish to review. The karate, self-defense and modern arnis for women and girls, ages seven and up is an ongoing beginner class.

New classes include the young women leaders program/youth empowerment project for girls ages seven-13, and a self-defense workshop for girls and boys seven-11. There is also a healing and strengthening exercise class consisting of exercises from tai chi and qigong.

Any student may participate in these workshops or classes through a monthly fee on a sliding scale based on income. For more information and to pre-register call (413) 527-0101.

Tamoxifen treatment study positive

By Paul Recer
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The lifesaving benefit of taking tamoxifen to treat early breast cancer lasts for at least a decade, but only if the drug is used for five years and no longer, two studies showed.

The studies, being published Wednesday in the Journal of the National Cancer Institute, found that women who took tamoxifen for five years after early breast cancer surgery had up to an 18 percent better chance of surviving without relapse than patients who did not take the drug.

One study showed that taking the drug for longer than five years conferred no survival advantage and could risk other disorders.

Experts praised the studies as providing important new insight into how to treat breast cancer at its earliest stages.

"These studies are extremely valuable," said Dr. Sandra M. Swain, a cancer specialist at the Comprehensive Breast Center in Washington. She said the findings now leave little question about the value of tamoxifen.

"In clinics all over the world, everyone will be using tamoxifen for five years now for sure," she said. "That is of major significance."

Tamoxifen, sold under the name Nolvadex, is prescribed as additional therapy after breast cancer surgery for women diagnosed with early stage disease.

A study by the National Surgical Adjuvant Breast and Bowel Project, a major contractor of the National Cancer Institute, gives statistical support for an NCI clinical alert issued last year that recommended tamoxifen not be used beyond five years.

That study began in 1982 and has involved more than 2,800 women.

In results published this week, the study found that women with early breast cancer, who were treated surgically and then took tamoxifen for five years, had a 12 percent better disease-free survival rate after 10 years than did women who did not take the drug after surgery.

The study found, however, that "no additional benefit was obtained from the administration of tamoxifen beyond five years."

It also found a slight increase in blood clots and endometrial cancer among women who continued the drug beyond five years when compared to women who stopped at five years. But specialist Swain of the Washington center suggested the numbers of these additional disorders may be too small to draw a statistically valid conclusion.

A second study, by the Swedish Breast Cancer Cooperative Group, compared the effects of the drug between two groups of women patients that took tamoxifen for either two years or five years. It measured the survival effect on both groups at 10 years after the cancer treatment started.

The study found 18 percent fewer deaths after 10 years among women who took the drug for five years after surgery compared to patients who took it for two years.

Media's twisted views hurt women

Amy Corvelyn

Two weeks ago, I was desperately channel surfing at 3 p.m. in the afternoon. It happened to be in the four minutes before the next show starts and the last show ended. Naturally, all I could find was commercials and more commercials. On a pause between channels, I rested on a pick up truck commercial. This truck was amazing. It rambled over boulders, through deserts gulchs and around steep curves before hauling to the top of a rocky mountain to rest-victorious. Following the trek, a disclaimer ran across the bottom of the screen. In minuscule lettering, read this message: DO NOT TRY THESE STUNTS ARE PERFORMED BY A TRAINED PROFESSIONAL!! Okay, okay, I thought to myself, point taken. I guess I won't be taking on any treacherous paths.

With the next flip, I came face to face with supermodel Claudia Schiffer. A black screen behind her, Claudia was tossing her blond mane as she romped playfully to the tune of her own voiceover-in her skivvys. No shirt, no skirt, just Claudia wearing little more than the day she was born. Frantically, I searched the bottom of the screen for some type of message, a disclaimer anything. But there was nothing. There was no message to women warning them: DO NOT TRY TO LOOK LIKE THIS! THIS WEIGHT COULD BE HAZARDOUS TO YOUR HEALTH!

Is Claudia to blame for her figure? Is it her responsibility as a supermodel extraordinaire to look out for the self esteems of millions of adolescent women? Hardly, but when a commercial is seen repeatedly by millions of people each day, the differentiation between what is selling a product and what is reality becomes cloudy.

The women we see in advertisements and in television commercials are not a realistic representation of women. The women we see on billboards and in the pages of Glamour magazine have emaciated bodies, perfect, white skin and expensive clothing. There are no heavy models, no short models and very few models of color. With the bombardment of these images each and every day in a person's life, women are faced with a choice: either be like Claudia or you will not exist to anyone.

Body image has become the definition of my generation. Anorexia, bulimia, compulsive eating and bulimerexia are common answers for many women who are looking for a way to control the aspects of their lives through food. Twenty-five percent of college women suffer from an eating disorder. This statistic is probably painfully low due to the difficulty in diagnosing eating disorders and the patient's resistance to get help. I do not believe advertising companies are to blame for the rise in eating disorders and poor self image in college age and teenage women. However, with the repetition of these images day in and day out, women in this age group (myself included) feel pressure to have the same body type and size which has garnered such an obscene amount of attention.

So maybe, it is the men running the advertisement agencies and the companies which run the ads to represent their product who are to blame? I would be inclined to believe this statement but I have heard many men voice their opinion that today's models are not attractive due to their lack of size. "Kate Moss is gross." "Who wants those bones digging into you?" If this is the general consensus of the male population (and we know how important their opinion is,) why are we faced with the impossible task of fitting into this mold made famous by Kate and her malnourished posse?

The examples of the female "norm" are rampant on the television screen and the pages of magazines. Another flip of the clicker shows a woman painting her house in her underwear, getting the kids off to school in her underwear and yes, even running out the door with her shirt open and underwear in full view. These are nothing more than the Hanes Her Way girls, flaunting their perfect, underdressed bodies. They are happy, smiling, (probably freezing) and without a noticeable brain their heads. I don't paint my house in my underwear, so how does this ridiculous advertisement convince me to buy the underwear Hanes is selling?

Are the women in the Hanes commercial the male fantasy incarnate? Or in the same way women have been socialized to attempt to look this way, have men been trained to believe this is the ideal woman? The "ideal" woman never speaks. Her smile and her flawless body are her voice. She has no opinions, no complaints and no problems. It seems to me this "woman" is not a member of the female gender.

I certainly cannot relate to this symbol of perfection. She represents a small portion of the female gender and yet she controls how women dress, eat and act toward the rest of the human race. However, the effects of this ideal women on the rest of the female population goes much deeper than the advertisements themselves.

It is the psychological breakdown of female self esteem through the barrage of media images which stereotype and demean us. Women are becoming unable to escape the silent attack on their psyches which has come in the form of perky breasts and underdeveloped waist lines.

Book to aid college bound

Anna Lotto
Collegian Staff

In September, 1997, the publishers Ferras, Strauss and Giroux will be publishing a collection of college women's essays portraying various aspects of what to look for in choosing a college.

In the words of editor Christina Page, the book will be an "honest perspective" on what different colleges are like. Essays vary in topics from what it is like to be a black female at an all white school to coming out as a lesbian at an all women's college.

There are four topics still needing to be covered, according to Page. She is looking for brief (about 1200-1500 words) accounts of college life that are "creative and have a very unique voice."

So far the essays collected are very diverse in their voices, Page said. The four topics she is still interested in are: the experience of a small liberal arts school, how a women's studies department influences the curriculum at a school, what it is like to change a major once or several times and finally, how the financial support offered by a college influences what school is chosen.

Christina Page, who is currently 25, graduated from Goucher College (in Baltimore) in 1993 with a double major in English and Women's Studies. While there, Page "observed the effect the increasing male population had upon the academic, social and living environments of what was once a strong women's college."

She attended Oxford University where she studied women's writing. She then worked in the editorial department at Ms. magazine, interviewing and researching candidates for the Ms. election guide. Later, she was Gloria Steinem's personal assistant for several years.

Most recently, she worked at Glamour magazine where she was actively involved in the Glamour's Top Ten College Women Competition issue. Currently, she is the editor of the women's section of Crisp, the first on-line global, interactive magazine.

Working at Ms. with Steinham was "a great experience," said Page, who has received dozens of submissions from women in college by contacting student newspapers, college professors and national magazines and newspapers which have published stories by written by college women.

The book is meant to be an informative tool for high school girls looking for to choose a college. Part of Page's goal, she says, is to "explain to these girls once and for all" what the college experience will be. In her own words, Page had "really no idea what to expect" from leaving home and attending a higher education institution.

As well as providing an insider's view of college, the book will also provide facts and statistics about college life at different kinds of schools. It will explain what the laws are to protect women in higher education (such as school policies on sexual harassment and sexual assault).

There will also be a questionnaire for the prospective college woman to fill out. This questionnaire is meant to "help her find important information not mentioned in the college catalogs," said Page.

Since the college decision time often very confusing and frustrating experience for girls, this book is meant to offer a sense of guidance from women only a few years older, who had the same questions and now offer honest answers.

Anyone interested in submitting a personal essay for the book should contact Christina Page at (212) 983-7281 for details. The deadline for contacting her is the end of November.

To members of the UMass community:

The most common comment heard from friends whom do not understand the importance of Women's Issues is "why are there women's issues when there is no such thing as men's issues?" This comment not only frightens me, but forces me to realize that people are ignorant to what women's issues entails.

Women's Issues serves to inform the campus of events ocurring that might otherwise not be publicized. More importantly, Women's Issues is an outlet for women to voice their opinions, concerns and criticisms of a society which is virtually controlled by male ideology.

Writing for Women's Issues does not mean you hate men, are a lesbian or even identify yourself as a feminist. It requires a general passion for women's rights and empowerment through words.

Issues range from sexism on campus, degration of women in advertising, abortion rights, rape, genital mutilation, domestic violence, breast cancer, self-defense, health care, welfare, gender politics or campus organizations.

These issues will become neglected if more people do not actively participate in voicing them to the campus community. Unfortunately this is not the job of one woman or two, but of everyone with a voice.

Heavenly warms up pop lovers

Sheryl Crow still havin' fun, Chris Mars continues to explore

HEAVENLY
Operation Heavenly
K Records

As a member of the legendary Scottish pop band Tallulah Gosh, Amelia Fletcher virtually set the ground rules for the indie pop explosion that followed. Her work with the Wedding Present on their debut album George Best finds the band at its finest hour. To say the least, Fletcher has been an influential figure in the indie rock musical subculture.

For the better part of this decade Fletcher has concentrated her efforts on Heavenly, a band whose name perfectly fits their out-of-this-world brand of pop tunes.

Since releasing three full-length albums (their debut Heavenly Vs. Satan was never released domestically and is now long out-of-print) the band suffered a major setback when Fletcher's brother Matthew, who played drums in Tallaluh Gosh and Heavenly, took his own life. Operation Heavenly is dedicated to his memory.

Recorded before his tragic death, the album has hardly a somber moment but it maintains a depressing feel. For many bands whose careers have been cut short, the question of "what if" obviously lingers on. But for Heavenly this is a pointless exercise as they have already established themselves.

Overall the album fits neatly into their catalog. The most noticeable differences revolve around the absence of a horn section which lighted up their most last and inappropriately titled work, The Decline and Fall of Heavenly, and the beefing up of the guitar parts.

The heart of the album, however, remains the perfect upbeat pop songs. Take one listen to the killer second track "K-Klass Kisschase." If you still have questions consult your physician.

Operation Heavenly closes with "Pet Monkey," a duet between Fletcher and Calvin Johnson, indie rock's Renaissance Man. Unfortunately this is not "C is the Heavenly Option Part II." Imagine Amelia joining the Halo Benders. It works okay but leaves much to be desired compared to their first collaboration.

Heavenly embrace Operation Heavenly with open arms as this is the farewell album. The band decided to call it quits instead of working without Matther Fletcher, an essential member. Hopefully we can expect Amelia to stay busy warming up the hearts of pop fans everywhere. B (Mike Burke)

SHERYL CROW
Sheryl Crow
A&M

Watch out Alanis Morrisette, Sheryl Crow has returned to the mainstream with the release of her second album, Sheryl Crow.

Sheryl Crow shows a stronger, more powerful Crow, both vocally and musically. Whereas the multi-platinum Tuesday Night Music Club had a more melancholy, hard-luck type feel, Sheryl Crow takes off like the singer is blasting off in her own superstardom. Crow's confidence and gutty sentiments shine throughout as she holds back nothing and soulfully belts out powerful lyrics.

Track On Track Off

Along with the dance feel she used on "All I Wanna Do," also lies her passion for '70s rock. "Hard to Make a Change," and a few others, spotlight guitar work reminiscent of '70s Rolling Stones' material.

Crow plays many of the instruments on this album, including guitar, bass and keyboards. "Superstar" features Crow playing keyboards similar to Stevie Wonder style funk. Crow's winning formula is a presentation of a distinctively strong voice and an "anything goes" attitude over which she blends her unique musical influences. Whether it is a '90s or a '70s sound, the outcome is an excellent new album dealing with the singer's winding road to fame and the subsequent insight and glory that have led her to create a stronger and more daring album. Jacko & old friend expecting baby

LOS ANGELES (AP) — It's a thriller, all right: Michael Jackson's longtime friend is pregnant with his child.

And contrary to a tabloid report, artificial insemination was not how they did it and she's not getting paid, the 38-year-old pop superstar said Monday.

"I am thrilled that I will soon be a father and am looking forward, with great anticipation, to having this child," Jackson said in a statement. "This is my dream come true."

The mother is Debbie Rowe, a 37-year-old divorced nurse who has been a friend for 15 years, according to the statement released by Christine Holevas, Jackson's spokeswoman.

Holevas denied a Sunday report in the London tabloid News of the World that the baby was a product of artificial insemination and that Rowe was being paid $528,000 to have it.

"The reports speculating that Ms. Rowe was artificially inseminated, and that there is any economic relationship, are completely false and irresponsible," said the statement.

It did not say if the couple conceived the old-fashioned way.

"Michael regrets that the news of Debbie's pregnancy was accompanied by several false and distorted reports and speculations, and urges the media to respect his and Debbie's privacy," the statement read.

Holevas' assistant said there would be no comment other than the statement. She would not say where Rowe lived.

News of the World also reported that the baby is due in February, is a boy, and will be named Michael Jackson Jr. It said Rowe helped treat Jackson for vitiligo, a disorder that lightens the skin.

There are no marriage plans and Jackson will raise the child himself, the tabloid said.

Earlier this year Jackson divorced his wife of 20 months, Lisa Marie Presley. Both had appeared topless in his video, "You Are Not Alone."

In their first live interview after secretly exchanging vows in May 1994, the couple announced last year that they were having sex and implied they wanted to have children together. She already had two children from a previous marriage.

"We will be expecting a child — now when... " Presley-Jackson started to tell 60 million viewers on ABC's "PrimeTime Live," before Jackson interrupted her.

"We're not going to say when," he said. "Of course it's in the hands of the heavens."

Jackson also was the subject of a 13-month investigation that began in August 1993 when a 13-year-old boy claimed Jackson had sex with him. It ended after Jackson reached a multi-million-dollar out-of-court settlement with the boy. Prosecutors in Los Angeles and Santa Barbara counties refused to file charges.

Philadanco to hit FAC tonight

Collegian Staff

Dance enthusiasts take note: The Philadelphia Dance Company — known affectionately as Philadanco — will dance their way into the Fine Arts Center tonight. The company, known for its exciting and innovative choreography, will perform in the Concert Hall at 8 p.m.

Philadanco, which is predominately an African-American dance company, focuses on African-American choreographers. The dance program combines the delicate grace of ballet with modern and ethnic dance. The company's unique style spans the ages, from Stravinsky to Charles Mingus to Aretha Franklin.

Philadanco was founded in 1970 by Joan Myers Brown. In The Christian Science Monitor, Brown described the company, saying that, "We're a company of well-trained, highly skilled dancers. We also happen to be very exciting."

Philadanco's reputation for high quality excitement has not gone unnoticed. In 1981, the company was one of only 15 organizations to receive the prestigious National Choreography Planning Grant.

In addition, Philadanco is socially active. The group planned and organized the First International Conference on Black Dance Companies in 1988. Over 75 representatives came to Philadelphia to discuss blacks and dance. The conference has since grown to 400 participants. In 1990, Brown helped found the International Association of Blacks in Dance. She currently serves as chairwoman for the organization.

Tonight's program will include music by Otis Redding, Earth, Wind & Fire, Natalie Cole and Quincy Jones. Choreographers featured will be George Faison, Jawole Willa Jo Zollar and Talley Beatty.

Dances include "Just One More," "Try A Little Tenderness" and "I've Been Love You Too Long."

Tickets for Philadanco are $30, $25 and $15. Five College student tickets are $5 and under the age of 17, tickets are $10. To order tickets or for more information, please call the Box Office are 545-2511 or (800) 999-UMAS.

Wallace explores issues of the New South

RANGELEY WALLACE
No Defense
Wyatt Books/St. Martin's Press

What would you do if you had lived your life believing that your adored father could do no wrong and then, in one instant, had that vision completely destroyed?

The relationship between such a father and daughter takes center stage in Rangeley Wallace's debut novel, No Defense, a searing novel about the New South and the tensions that built it.

LuAnn Garrett returns to her hometown of Tallagumsa, Ala., to be close to her family. Her father, Newell Hargerdorn, is launching his bid to become governor and LuAnn is determined to support him in every way.

As LuAnn settles into her comfortable life, her serenity is shattered by the revelation that her father might have had something to do with the murders of two young black students who were to integrate a nearby state university.

LuAnn, who raised money for a memorial to the students, is caught between her loyalty to her father and the right thing to do. Blinded by her fierce devotion to her father, LuAnn's relationships with her husband, her mother and her sister, Jane, begins to deteriorate. Even after her father destroys Jane on the stand, LuAnn insists on Newell's innocence.

And when the verdict is finally announced and the truth about her father revealed, LuAnn is forced to confront her own moral values and examine the relationship she has with a father she no longer knows.

No Defense is a wonderful first novel from Wallace. Gripping drama and engrossing court scenes, coupled with the most mundane and ordinary of details, makes for a taut and thrilling story.

This is by no means a book on racism, but rather on the struggle the South has with its past and the issues that still plague it. LuAnn, with her confused principles and steadfast loyalty, is very much the epitome of that struggle. A-

Screeching Weasel, one can not judge him for hoping to make the kind of album he always dreamed of doing. It was a shame however, that the band he discontinued Screeching Weasel to create, The Riverdales, was a mediocre attempt to carry on the spirit of the Ramones.

Perhaps realizing how important Screeching Weasel is in the New School punk scene, Ben Weasel and company have regrouped and released an impressive new record. The album is filled with familiar style songs about our bored and burned out generation and, although it may not be Weasel's finest, it's still great to have them back together again.

Bark Like a Dog introduces new musical sounds in addition to the band's traditional guitars, bass and drums. On the album's second song, "Cool Kids," a keyboard adds an interesting new flair to their previous garage punk sound. Although this new direction may sound a bit silly, at least the band is attempting to progress.

The main problem with the album is that they signed from Lookout! to Fat Wreck Chords. Although a respected punk label, Fat has a definite sound that tends to be far to over produced and nicely polished. This may work well for Tilt, who also left Lookout for Fat, but it just doesn't fit with the cynical anger of Screeching Weasel. B–

CHRIS MARS
Anonymous Botch
Bar None

A little kid comes home from school and says to his Mom, "When I grow up I want to be a drummer."

"Honey," she replies, "You can't be both." Everybody knows a good drummer joke. Lucky for us, ex–Replacements drummer Chris Mars ignored the smart alecs and has delivered the goods once again on his fourth solo album, Anonymous Botch.

Continuing with the more experimental explorations that began on his last album, Tenterhooks, Mars develops these ideas further on Botch, stirring up a strange blend of spooky organ noises, swirling keyboard strings, and songs that hop from style to style with only a few serious missteps. All of this is still wrapped around Mars' tightly woven guitar pop — snappy drums and choppy guitars intact.

The result is a kind of lo–fi psychedelic circus garage pop. Songs like "The Conquering Cow Farmer" and "The Down Drag" are a perfect example of the odd musical universe that Mars occupies — a universe where Mars' extensive rock and pop vocabulary is filtered through the mind of a mad scientist. There are a few missteps of course. "Janet's New Kidney" is cumbersome and long, and "Funeral Hymn of the Small Critter Holocaust" loses its novelty appeal after a listen or two. Maybe the mad scientist needed some fresh air that day.

Those songs aside, Anonymous Botch is a fantastic album that rewards repeated listens with its rich, imaginative arrangements and toe–tapping pop sensibilities. Mars gets an extra point for the last song, "I'll Be Gone," too — an amazingly infectious horn–driven number that sounds like the theme to a TV show only playing in Chris Mars' truly original universe. B+ (Bradley Skaught)

Deep in the Heart of Tuva
ellipsis arts...

CD's from ellipsis arts... are packaged beautifully. This CD comes in a small hardcover book, in this case 64 pages long, which contains detailed background and history on the music. The CD's are well–recorded and the booklets extensive, easy–to–read, and colorful. Deep in the Heart of Tuva is no exception.

Tuva is a small nation between Siberia (to the north,) and Mongolia (to the south.) Overrun for centuries by Huns, Turks, Soviets and others, Tuva has experienced a resurgence of identity and culture since the dissolution of the Soviet Union. Part of this is a revival of traditional Tuvan throatsinging, or höömei.

This CD is an excellent introduction to the breadth of styles within höömei. Broken into four sections, the CD presents solo voice, and then voice accompanied by some of the distinctive Tuvan stringed instruments. The third section is an interesting exploration of Tuvan music in the modern world — we are presented with collaborations between Tuvan singers and the Bulgarian women's choir, Tuvan punk rock, and an industrial take on Tuvan traditional.

Deep in the Heart of Tuva is an interesting and warm introduction to this region's stunning musical culture. A– (Daniel Bodah)

Living a Shocking risk filled life

COURTESY MERCURY

Michelle Shocked

Singer–songwriter Michelle Shocked is no stranger to taking creative as well as personal risks. At 15, Texas–born Shocked ran away from home and went on to live in cities like Amsterdam and New York. Her past work has found the artist experimenting with musical styles ranging from folk, to rhythm and blues, to big–band era swing. Most recently Shocked risked her career fighting a four–year battle to free herself from a contract with her former label, Mercury Records, finally succeeding earlier this year. Through it all, Shocked — who will perform at Mt. Holyoke's Chapin Auditorium tonight — has always been "determined to survive." Kind Hearted Woman (Private Music), her first commercial release since 1992's Arkansas Traveler, is a testament to Shocked's exceptional strength as both woman and musician.

"In the case of this album," Shocked said, "I think there's a lot to be said for the role of the empathetic narrator — that I'm telling other people's stories, and I find other people's stories very moving to me."

This is a deeply personal, often dark record that conjures up images of rural American life, and is filled with songs of about loss, redemption and rebirth. On one track, for example, Shocked sings in her rich, throaty voice about a mother who gives birth to a stillborn baby; another track, "Hardy Way," is about learning from past mistakes and moving on.

"This album really catalysts, and then allows me to move on past what I've been through," she said.

Her battle with Mercury Records began in 1992, after the release of Arkansas Traveler, when Shocked was told that Mercury will no longer pay for her studio time because her material was "stylistically inconsistent." Mercury stopped promoting her records, but at the same time would not free her from the contract.

"What they were trying to do," Shocked said, "is, what they've done to so many artists that you go, 'I wonder what ever happened to...' They were trying to make me shut up and go away, because they figure there's plenty more where I came from."

The new album, Shocked said, "came together organically."

Shocked wrote the first three tracks for choreographer Mark Morris' modern dance piece and later recorded a demo version a friend's garage. She then toured for a year, selling limited–edition versions at concerts and through a mail order, to raise money to record the album in a studio. Earlier this year, Shocked finally freed herself from Mercury, signed with Private Music and has released the album commercially to the public.

Despite the melancholy nature of many of the tracks on the album, Shocked's live performances — which are known to sometimes exceed three hours — are nothing short of uplifting, spiritually, cleansing experience, throughout which Shocked intersperses quiet acoustic solos with wild, soulful R&B numbers.

Shocked said she has no regrets about her "four–year limbo," and that for her needs, it was "worth the sacrifice." As for the future plans, she wants to go back into the studio, to record a rhythm–and–blues album with members of the group Tony, Toni, Tone after completing her upcoming tour of Europe, and maybe even write a book.

Michelle Shocked performs tonight at Chapin Auditorium at Mt Holyoke at 8 p.m. Tickets are available at the door.

THEFT OF MEDICAL EXAM FOILED IN S.F.
17-year-old With Nonfunctioning Gun Beaten by Students

By H. K. Lee and C. Bowman, Chronicle Staff Writers

A young masked gunman burst into a room full of students taking a medical exam Saturday in San Francisco and demanded a copy of a test section but was thwarted when several outraged proctors and would-be doctors punched him out, police said yesterday.

Police said the youth grabbed a green folder at the front of the room, disappeared into a bathroom and then re-emerged, cursing. He then confronted a proctor, demanding the Physical Sciences portion of the test. As the proctor fumbled for the test section, the youth may have been careless with his gun—the proctor grabbed it, and suddenly the intruder found himself at gunpoint.

The youth then apparently smacked the proctor in the face. Enraged, at least five proctors and test-takers surrounded the suspect and threw punches at him, drawing blood, witnesses said...

BC gets no sympathy from UM

Luke Meredith

Out here in Hooterville, as the Boston Globe has dubbed UMass, we love to bash Boston College. We dub them "elitist trash," mocking them as rich snobs who thumb their nose at state institutions like UMass. It's an age–old battle of the upper class (BC) and the middle class (UMass), the Brahmins and the Irish, the silver–spooned and the not–so silver–spooned. But what has happened this past week at the Heights goes way beyond any fickle rivalry. Allegations of a point shaving scandal involving BC football players swirl around the Chestnut Hill campus, threatening to bring down coach Dan Henning, and perhaps the storied Eagle program with him.

Here are the facts as we know it. Four players on the BC football team are under investigation for betting on college football games, and possibly betting on the Eagles to lose. The four players have hired a lawyer, and have met with BC athletic director Chet Gladchuck behind closed doors. The Boston Globe also reported yesterday that senior wide receiver Kenyatta Watson, who was interviewed about the gambling scandal, but is not one of the four at center of the controversy, was disciplined by the school for misuse of a stolen credit card at the beginning of the year. The BC program is crumbling by the minute.

If this scandal proves to be true, whoa nellie. College football has been relatively scandal–free this season. As we all know, there have been a few ugly incidents in the past ten years, from Nebraska's light treatment of such girlfriend– beating thugs as Lawrence Phillips and Christian Peter, Oklahoma's coke–selling quarterbacks and steroid freak linebackers, and basically everything the Miami Hurricanes have ever done. But we've been okay this season. That might have something to do with the fact that Nebraska was knocked off the top slot early, taking the spotlight off of Lincoln, and the slip in on–the–field success of Miami, Nebraska and other notoriously corrupt programs.

The focus this year has been on–the–field. There has been some good football played this year, and the national championship is still up for grabs, sparking debate over who deserves the phantom No. 1 come January. But, people had not been talking about arrests, drugs or paid players, at least until Sunday. Now, thanks to the apparent stupidity of a few bad apples, college football is once again the scourge of the earth. There are many out there who would like nothing more than to see college football as we know it vanish, administrators who see big–time collegiate athletics as an impediment to education, and will jump on any chance to condemn sport to hell.

To these administrators I say, "Chill!" This gambling scandal is big, and if it's proven out it could leave the CFA with a bad taste in it's mouth for years. But do not indict a whole system because of this. Point shaving has been in college sports as long as they've existed. Kentucky basketball was rocked by a point–shaving scandal in the early '50s, and there have been isolated incidents throughout the last 40 years. I'll be the first to admit that major college sports have some problems, and the whole system of how it's governed and run must be re–examined, but this has nothing to do with that. If anything, this is the work of a few kids who got in over their heads and didn't see the moral and ethical implications of what they were doing. The system didn't make these kids bet, these kids bet on their own. What people also forget is that betting on college campuses is commonplace, and that, after all, football players are still college kids like the rest of us. So don't try to bring big–time college athletics to its knees because of an isolated incident.

As for the students of BC, I have only this to say. This summer we had the Marcus Camby cash and jewelry incident, now you have this. Consider us even.

Milbury has fled for Long Island, and the coach of those old–time hockey teams, Don Cherry, can't be budged from his CBC studio job with a Mack Truck and has a video empire that nearly outsells Playboy's Jenny McCarthy line.

Miserly Sinden avoided the free–agent pool, passing the buck on several quality, albeit high–priced players, along with many Devil and Panther–esque players with mid–range salaries. To top it off, he shipped away McEachern and Reid, two players who fit the team's concept du jour perfectly.

Sinden wouldn't pay a penny then, but he's paying now.

Only three Eastern Conference teams are above .500. I kid you not, just look at the standings. Those three? Florida (understandable) along with Hartford and Tampa Bay. Like in Wayne's World, monkeys are not flying out of my ass, the Pope is not a Buddhist, and Ross Perot is not our new President–elect this morning; the records are true.

The East's best has moved to the other side of the Mississippi, and what is left pales in comparison. Last year, the league's most up–and–coming team, Quebec, moved West, added the best money goaltender in hockey, and drank from hockey's coveted chalice.

It isn't only teams as superstars like Jeremy Roenick and Brendan Shanahan have recently found themselves fulfilling their own manifest destinies. With the St. Louis Blues adding Pierre Turgeon to feed Brett Hull last week, another western team stands poised for a run.

• Meanwhile, back where the Alleghany meets the Monongahela, Pittsburgh is surprisingly being washed out to sea. The one–time beast of the East is 3–9 and only Mario among the league's top 20 scorers. The recent addition of Petr Klima, who has three points in three games with the Pens, will help, but Pittsburgh will have to rally to save face this season. Unlike the Bruins, there is simply no reason for this team to be wastin' away.

Leigh Torbin is a Collegian columnist.

see just once. How much would Tampa Bay give up for four straight Super Bowls, regardless of the jokes heaped upon them for losing?

Sadly, these three won't last forever. Like the great Joe Montana before them, there will come a time when they have to hang up their cleats.

What makes it even sadder, is there may be no one to replace them. Brett Favre has emerged into the spotlight, and Drew Bledsoe is once again looking brilliant, but they could also turn out to be just a–few–year wonders, à la Randall Cunningham.

The other young QBs around the league don't even show that much promise. Rick Mirer and Heath Shuler, former first round picks, languish on the sidelines, and should probably be joined by Trent Dilfer.

So, take a minute to pray to the football gods and hope the big three hold on a little longer. They may beat your team time and time again, but they make the games fun to watch.

New England fans are starting to say two words no one was expecting from them at the start of the year — "Super Bowl."

There is definitely some reason. New England, after starting 0–2, has gone 6–1, including three straight wins over AFC East teams.

Their win last Sunday over Miami tied them with Buffalo for first place in the division with a 6–3 record. (The teams are tied on the first tie–breakers, head to head record and division record, but the Pats have a big lead in the next tie–breaker, conference record at 5–2 to the Bills' 3–3.)

Even better for the Patriots is that their closest competition is going downhill. The Colts, who started 4–0 are now 5–4, and Miami has dropped from 3–0 to 4–5. The Bills, despite their recent success in Washington, have had a stagnant offense, and are lucky to have the record they have. The Pats also should have an easy win next week with the Jets, though they can't afford to overlook them.

However, don't lose sight of the fact that New England is still one of the youngest teams in the NFL, and have very little playoff experience. Even most of the veterans have had little success in the playoffs — after all, it was Willie Clay's Detroit Lions that were demolished by Philadelphia in the playoffs last year. Last time the Patriots made the Big Dance, in 1994, they were kicked out after one game. What their recent play may do in getting them to the Super Bowl is keep head coach Bill Parcells. As long as he keeps enjoying himself, which he has been during the winning streak the team has going, the coach should be back. And provided they get a good defensive lineman in the offseason, keeping Parcells should get them to where they've only been once before — the Super Bowl.

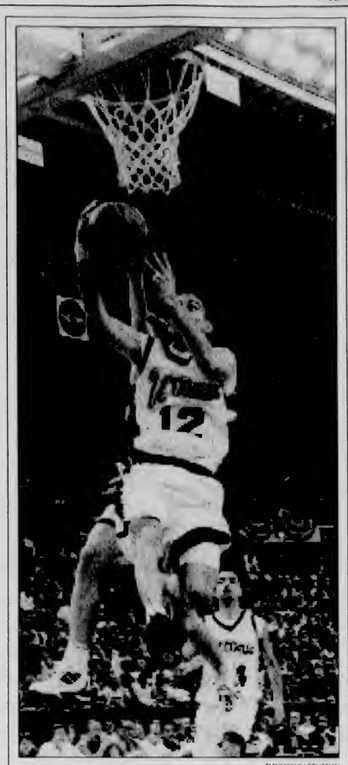
Boston's Rocket opts for free agency

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

BOSTON — Red Sox pitcher Roger Clemens, who has three Cy Young Awards and as many wins in a Boston uniform as Young himself, yesterday filed for free agency for the first time in his 13–year career.

The 34–year–old pitcher is looking for a four–year contract, while the Red Sox are reportedly offering shorter deals that could grow to four years if Clemens meets performance or endurance thresholds.

Clemens has said he would only pitch for Boston or a team in his home state of Texas — either the Rangers or Astros. But other teams in need of starting pitching — and just about all of them are — could try to convince him otherwise.



"We intend to consider all of Roger's options, including Boston," said Randy Hendricks, who along with his brother Alan represents Clemens. "We don't plan to do anything substantive until later month."

The Red Sox still do not have a manager, with former Cardinals manager Whitey Herzog turning Boston down this week, according to an ESPN report. Herzog is the second potential manager to shun the Red Sox, joining ex–Pirates manager Jim Leyland. Duquette does not return calls seeking comment. He has said that he would like to re–sign Clemens — but only on the team's terms. Clemens also fumed after the Red Sox fired pitching coach Al Nipper, a good friend and former teammate, following the team's 6–19 start. And Clemens took some parting shots at management after what may be have been his Fenway finale.

she, and the team, stands yet.

"We have gone to the Final Four, so we know how that feels, and we know winning A–10's, so we have been through everything together," Magid said about her fellow seniors. "I think outside of soccer, everyone has become a little closer, especially now everyone is like this is our last couple of games...the season's almost over... what are you going to do?"

"It is scary in a way, because I think of it is as: I don't know if I am going to play soccer after this. There's not many chances for women to play after collegiate soccer. You can go to Europe, and play in some leagues, but do you get paid? Not really. So, it's tough. All I can say is that I want to make the most of it now, and finish out strong. I am sure everyone else does, the seniors and including the rest of the team."

Whatever happens in this Friday's matchup with rival George Washington in the A–10's; or if UMass does/does not receive an NCAA bid next Monday; or if Magid does not get a chance to relive her career high point of the Final Four; Rudy knows how he feels about one of his seniors, and you better sit down, because it is some kind of wonderful.

"She has been a joy to work with, because she shows up on time. She's honest. She's neat. She's prompt. She's reliable as hell, doesn't have any kdty preconceptions and she is a real fine human being," Rudy said. "I have really enjoyed my four years with her. I can say that I have not had one problem with Julie. This is one kid that has played in many games with major pain, will stay in there no matter what and will come off the field at the end of a game in tears, last year in particular, and she just hung in there the whole time.

"She has a lot of courage as a player, and she is just a real fine, solid example of what the best is in her generation. The only problem I have ever had is trying to figure out how to play without her when she would observe religious holidays... that is right on, accurate."

HOROSCOPES

ARIES
March 21–April 20

A volatile situation could be on the brink of an explosion. Use tact with a particularly difficult person to avert disaster. Your hotheadedness could be part of the problem, too, so resist the temptation to speak your mind. Avoid exaggeration when it comes to matters of the heart.

TAURUS
April 21–May 21

It's time to take action on a problem that's been nagging at you for a while. More discussion will only delay things. That special someone could have something on his or her mind, and you're just the person to share it with.

GEMINI
May 22–June 21

Don't allow a committee's indecision at work to drag on. Keep your head together when planning weekend activities. Someone could propose a wild and crazy idea. It may sound like fun, but is it worth the risk? Think twice before going along with the crowd.

CANCER
June 22–July 22

Where a battle of wits and power is concerned, you'd do well to stay as far away from the conflict as possible. An interesting proposal comes from an unexpected direction. Consider carefully before giving your answer. An old friend has some happy news.

LEO
July 23–August 23

If you're faced with a difficult situation, step back for a moment and take time to decide exactly what you want. Then get through to the person who has the power to fix things, and start talking. Just don't give in, and everything should work out.

VIRGO
August 24–September 22

Stay away from a battling pair—they could try to entangle you in their conflict, and you don't want to get caught in the middle. Keep open the lines of communication with your sweetie to avoid a petty argument. Try an evening alone—just the two of you.

LIBRA
September 23–October 23

Pay close attention to the person who can help you gain the experience you need to get to the next level. Someone may be giving you a subtle hint that you haven't yet picked up on. Turmoil at home or in the office raises your stress level.

SCORPIO
October 24–November 22

Speed is the key to most difficulties this week. Are you moving too slowly on a project? Recklessly fast so that you miss important details? Focus on watching your speed all the time—in traffic, too. Careful driving could be a major issue for you in the weeks ahead.

SAGITTARIUS
November 23–December 21

If you're feeling trapped and stressed, treat yourself to a little adventure. Search for buried treasure, or just stage a great escape. You don't need to travel long distances to find happiness. It could be staring you right in the face.

CAPRICORN
December 22–January 20

Avoid reckless moves that will burn your bridges behind you. Compromises will work much better at enabling you to achieve your long term goals. An intense relationship could be floundering—do you have enough in common to make it work?

AQUARIUS
January 21–February 18

A zest for exploration takes hold of you this week and you could be ready to climb mountains. Instead of blowing your vacation on a prohibitively expensive trip, try to change the things in your life that cause you stress. A co-worker may not understand where you're coming from.

PISCES
February 19–March 20

Although it may seem as though a committee has accomplished nothing, the groundwork is in place for some really exciting developments. Be patient, and watch things take off. Take on a little extra responsibility and you'll notice results.

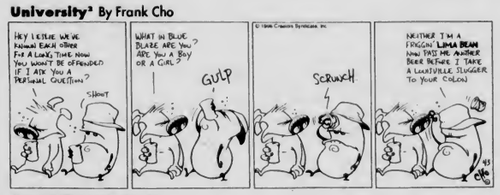
A lot of people didn't believe her.



Then, when she was 15, a TV repairman told her that her teeth braces could act like a cyrstal radio and actually pick up radio waves.

I think it's amazing.

To this day.... even though her braces are off, she told us at lunch yesterday.... she can still hear Jimi Hendrix's "Purple Haze" when she sticks out her lower jaw.

UMass hoops break in Mullins with pair of games

Bruiser Ball's first exam

You've seen the posters. You've heard all about the recruits, and today, you have a chance to see the team for yourself. That's right, "Bruiser Ball" comes bouncing into the William D. Mullins Center tonight as the men's basketball team plays its first exhibition game of the season against Marathon Basketball at 8:30 p.m.

The contest marks the first look UMass fans will have at the post–Calipari, post–Marcus Camby Minutemen. Tonight marks the debut of the here and now. The team that takes the court against Marathon will take its first step in forming its own identity. While the world of college basketball has been flooded with speculation as to how the team will fare with new head coach James "Bruiser" Flint and his new front court, the time is finally approaching when we can focus on what's happening on the court, not in a press conference.

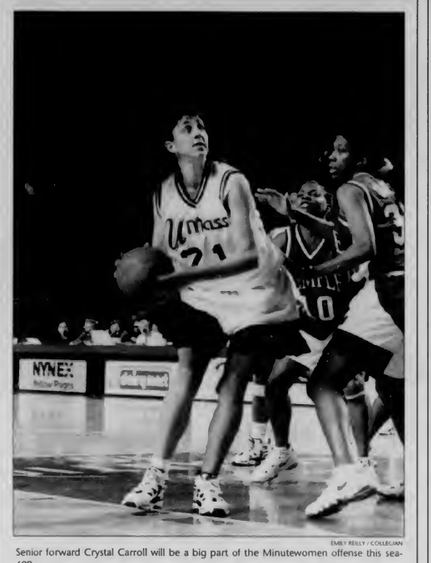
If preseason games of the past are any indication, chances are, we will not see the full smash–'em, bash–'em hoopsters of the regular season. Remember last year's 94–89 loss to former Minutemen Derek Kellogg and the Converse All–Stars? How many of us had the numbers 35–2 on our minds when we left the Mullins then?

Chris Stamm

What you will get a chance to see on the Mullins floor this evening is a game where Flint can test the waters of his fledgling front court.

For the first time, Minuteman fans will get a chance to see 6–foot–10, 250–pound Lari Ketner in the middle. After sitting out last season under Proposition 48 NCAA academic requirements, Ketner will look to provide a bruising one–two punch in the paint with senior power forward Tyrone Weeks.

In addition, rookies Mike Babul, Winston Smith, Chris Kirkland and Ajmal Basit will begin to see how they fit into the UMass lineup.



The Minutemen play their final exhibition game on Nov. 15 when they will look to revenge last year's loss to the Converse All–Stars.

The regular season begins Thanksgiving weekend when UMass travels to Hawaii for the Maui Invitational to face host Chaminade in the first round.

UM women face b–ball legend

By Fred Hurlbrink, Jr.
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team will break in their first pair of game sneakers this season as they take on the Athletes in Action USA women's b–ball squad at the William D. Mullins Center tonight at 5 p.m.

The Minutewomen of the hardwood are coming off their most successful season in school history. University of Massachusetts coach Joanie O'Brien led her constantly improving club to the NCAA tournament for the first time ever where they were narrowly defeated by a strong Michigan State team.

UMass logged a 20–10 record last season placing second in the Atlantic 10 East with an 11–5 mark. The Minutewomen were an unblemished 12–0 on the Mullins floor last winter, including a 65–56 upset victory over then No. 8 Stanford.

Back to the here and now: the Minutewomen are faced with their first test of the season in the form of an AIA team that features Nancy Lieberman–Cline who is widely known as the greatest female basketball player in history.

At 18, Lieberman–Cline became the youngest athlete to ever win an Olympic basketball medal, garnering a silver with the 1976 USA women's team.

An aunt of UMass volleyball player Jill Myers, she was also the first woman ever to play in a professional men's league. In 1986, she played for the Springfield Fame, and two years later she became the first woman to join the Harlem Globetrotter's World Tour as a member of the Washington Generals.

In 1993, Lieberman–Cline was inducted into the New York City Basketball Hall of Fame, and this May she was inducted into the Naismith Memorial Basketball Hall of Fame in Springfield.

At the age of 38, Lieberman–Cline is looking forward to seeing action with her AIA teammates.

"It will allow me to be around other Christians in a daily environment," she said. "I can share my testimony with my teammates and others, while playing serious basketball."

Athletes in Action was founded in 1966 by Dave Hannah as an outreach to spiritually motivated athletes. AIA actually fields competitive teams in several sports including men's and women's basketball.

As for the UMass contingent, the Minutewomen will be led by the senior triad of Beth Kuzmeski, Crystal Carroll and Sabriya Mitchell.

Kuzmeski, coming off a year in which she averaged 7.3 points per game for the Minutewomen, is one of the most prolific 3–point threats in UMass women's hoop history. The 5–7 guard lays claim to the school's career mark for 3–pointers made with 103.

Carroll (6–2) is the key in the pivot where she averaged 12.1 points in 30 contests last season. Mitchell will run the UMass offense from the point.

Magid a steady presence at UM

Midfielder set to play out her under–acknowledged career

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

To put it bluntly, the No. 14 Massachusetts women's soccer team (14–3–1) have been on an emotional roller coaster this season. From opening up with nine consecutive victories, to a stretch of four games with only a win to show, UMass has had to weather their ups and downs.

One of the players that has been a steading influence during all of this is senior midfielder Julie Magid. An overused cliche' in team sports is a squad has to be strong up the middle to succeed. If that is true, then UMass has it in spades. Magid and sophomore defender Amanda Thompson have provided strength up the center of the pitch, and especially when it has counted the most.

Magid's role has been changed and heightened since the career–ending injury of fellow senior Rebecca Myers on Oct. 4 in a 3–0 win against La Salle. She had to take on a responsibility she was unaccustomed to during the last four years, and that was "offensive" to her. Specifically, Myers had traditionally been the one who would step up into the front line on offense, and Magid would keep an eye on her back. The duo worked for the Minutewomen, as Myers broke the all–time career goals and points mark this season, with unspoken, but heartfelt, kudos to her midfield mate.

For Magid, the team is the one who has handled that mid– season crisis, and she has only done her part.

"I think my role has changed a bit, I have been a bit more on the offensive, whereas before Rebecca was all on the offensive, and I just hung back and controlled the middle," Magid said. "I think that was a big change in my style. I was able to go forward more, opposed to more hanging back and waiting for things to occur.

"I think I've handled it well. Its tough when you lose one of your star players, especially playing with her in the middle for three years and then, all of the sudden, what you both have worked for in your senior year, is all gone now."

Coach Jim Rudy lets anyone know where his opinion on Magid stands: top shelf, top billing and top of the line.

"Julie has done a magnificent job this year at holding the center of the field down, and she has done that here for four years," Rudy said. "What a super, solid four years of play, and I think her game has benefited our team.

"I've always said there are two people that we would really be hard up to play without. The answer surprises a lot of people, but it's Julie Magid and Amanda Thompson, just because they are always there and they are a structure for the rest of the team."

It has been an exciting four years for the Dallas native, but throughout this time, one of the perks of the job was playing against her former teammates and adversaries from her home state. The past two seasons Magid has had a chance to play against players like SMU's Danielle Brousseau and Amy Klein, and Texas A&M's Bryn Blalack.

This past weekend at the Post Oak Mall Soccer Classic in College Station, Tx., was homecoming in a way. She, her fellow Texans (Lynch and Thompson) and the team enjoyed the most of it; especially a 2–0 win over then No. 15 George Mason.

"With Texas A&M, I either played with or against half of the team," Magid said. "And with Bryn Blalack, I either played with or against her since Under–12. So, it's great to travel around and see everyone, especially since it's senior year, and everyone's graduating."

After this weekend's Atlantic 10 Championships, the collective fate of the team, and the individual fate of Magid, will be held up in balance. The Minutewomen are on the bubble concerning NCAA postseason play, and if the season ends on the pitch of the URI Soccer (Not–Too) Complex, this might be it for Magid as a soccer career. Four years of teamwork with the five other seniors might come to an end, and she does not know where

B's in trouble; East, Pens slip early

It's been almost 20 years since Jimmy Buffett released not necessarily his greatest, but certainly his most well known single, "Margaritaville," and he still hasn't found his lost shaker of salt.

In that same two–decade span, Bruins GM Harry Sinden has tinkered with all types of playing styles, but still hasn't captured that elusive Cup.

After an ugly 4–4 home tie against Los Angeles Monday night, it's safe to say that this year's team is wastin' away again as well. On the ice, the B's have been aimlessly drifting and just trying to reason with hurricane season as lesser teams have been blowing past my beloved Black and Gold on their supposed home ice.

The nasty results don't end there. The B's are 1–4–3 at the FleetCenter this year. In the past seven days alone they've had to come from behind in the final minutes, at home, to tie Hartford and LA, while being obliterated by a suddenly clicking, legit and scary Broadway Blueshirt team.

Leigh Torbin on the NHL

Margaritas might be the frozen concoction that helps Buffett hang on, but for most of my life, Bruins hockey has served that purpose, so do not be surprised to find me at El Acuña later trying the Reverend Jim's preferred frozen treat.

I'm almost ashamed to admit that I paid an awful lot of good money to watch this team "play" the Florida Panthers in last year's playoffs, and then actually believed that things would change for this year, minus Shawn McEachern, the team's hardest working player from that series.

After a couple of years of trying to build a solid veteran team that could win on experience, Sinden is now trying to replicate the Panther and Devil systems that ousted his team the past two years en route to the finals. McEachern or Dave Reid would fit perfectly on either of those clubs; the players Sinden acquired this summer would do better wielding clubs.

What made those clubs successful is players like Claude Lemieux and Tom Fitzgerald who are hard–nosed, solid defensive forwards with excellent speed and ability to both blow away a goalie, or blow away an opponent with an open–ice hip check. It is a rare and valued combination in a player, one which is in short–supply league–wide, and one most Bruins lack.

Rick Tocchet, who has had his career rejuvenated in Boston, is the one member of this team that could probably most–easily meld in with the 1970's lunch–pail gang that Sinden apparently wants to model this club after.

A perfect coach for this type of system, disciplinarian Pat Burns, is home in Ontario, while the inexperienced Steve Kasper still guides the team and learns on the job.

Something is rotten in Massachusetts when the Bruins need a goal by Mattias Timander with 1:04 to play to tie the Kings at home before about 4,300 empty seats.

Perhaps the most poignant assessment of this lost team came from ex–Bruin Kevin Stevens, making his return to the FleetCenter in the uniform of the one silver and black team left in L.A. Although born in Brockton, a happier Stevens just didn't know the reason why he stayed here all season.

"There's a lot of pressure there and I don't think it's the right kind of pressure," he said. "When I was there everyone wasn't on the same page. They say they want to play like Florida. But to play like Florida you have to believe in what you're doing. It's hard to do that if you're not all on the same page."

It's an issue of management or lack there of, pure and simple. GM–in–waiting and lunch–pail ring–leader Mike

Class of '83 still throwin'; Elway on top

"Rumors of my death have been greatly exaggerated." — Mark Twain

The same could be said for three of the greatest names in National Football League history

As with the last couple of years, the talk before this seasbn was whether Dan Marino, John Elway and Jim Kelly — the remaining members of the great quarterback class of 1983 — were too old and beat up to continue to play.

And, for a while it seemed like it was true. True, Elway still seemed to be in command, leading his team — with the help of RB Terrell Davis — to a stunning 8–1 record, but the other two...

Marino started the season hot but then was stuck on the sidelines with a broken ankle, forced to watch his team drop three games. Since returning, he's 0–2, losing to Dallas and New England.

And, simply nothing was going right for Buffalo's star QB, Kelly. He also was forced to miss some games due to injury, though he had the good fortune to watch his backup lead his team to two wins.

Or was it fortune? Kelly is having a horrible year, at one point throwing 11 interceptions to two touchdowns. Nothing was worse than the loss to Miami, where Kelly had seemed to bring his team back, only to be called for intentional grounding at the goal line and then throw the balls into the hands of Dolphin DB Terrell Buckley. Fans were calling for the man that led his team to be benched for his eventual successor.

But, this weekend Kelly bounced back, proving there's still a few good games left in the big three.

Joe Montana

Once again operating the K–Gun offense he made famous, Kelly completed 19 of 23 passes, for 206 yards, leading his team to a 38–13 thrashing of the NFC East–leading Redskins.

It was also in the K–Gun that the Bills showed any success before, helping bring them back against the Jets and almost coming back against the Patriots.

For Elway, unlike his compatriots, this has been as good a season as any. The Denver Broncos share the league's best record (8–1) with only Green Bay, after Elway did what he does best against Oakland on Monday night.

Trailing in the fourth quarter, Elway did what he had done 34 times before (second most behind Marino), and led his team back to victory.

Often belittled for their collective 0–9 record in the Super Bowl, fans overlook the obvious. What makes these men so impressive is not only their statistics, but what they have done. Year after year, they have led their team to the promised land, something other teams would love to

Bhutto warns president to prepare for a fight

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan (AP) - A day after her rule came to an abrupt and inglorious end, a defiant Benazir Bhutto yesterday warned the man who fired her to prepare for a fight.

"I don't allow people to kick me out. Win or lose, I fight," she said in an interview with the Associated Press at her official residence, where she has spent the last 24 hours under army guard.

On Tuesday, her former ally, President Farooq Leghari, dismissed her and accused her of a litany of wrongs — sponsoring police hit squads, condoning runaway corruption and bringing the economy to the brink of bankruptcy.

Many Pakistanis believe the president may use the charges to bar her from politics. She also may face criminal charges. But Bhutto dismissed the allegations as the machinations of an ambitious politician.

"My hands are clean," said Bhutto, who accused the president of trading their 20–year friendship for power.

Leghari has promised to hold elections on Feb. 3, nearly two years ahead of schedule. The interim prime minister and Cabinet ministers he appointed met for the first time yesterday, vowing to curb corruption and government spending and organize free and fair elections.

Perry, Christopher plan to leave cabinet

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. (AP) — Defense Secretary William Perry and Secretary of State Warren Christopher have told President Clinton that they will resign, administration and military officials said yesterday, leaving the re–elected president with vacancies in two of the Cabinet's most prestigious posts.

Also about to depart are Commerce Secretary Mickey Kantor and Energy Secretary Hazel O'Leary, officials said.

Christopher informed Clinton of his decision Tuesday night in Little Rock, Ark., as election returns were showing the president had won a second term. The 71–year–old Christopher's four years as secretary of state have been dominated by fighting in Bosnia and efforts to forge peace in the Middle East, and a preference for low–key persuasion.

Perry, 69, rose from the No. 2 job at the Pentagon after the resignation of Clinton's initial choice for the job, former Rep. Les Aspin (D–Wis.). He said he would stay on until a replacement is found.

Word of all four resignations came from officials who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The Cabinet changes could soon total six, aides said, as Clinton prepares his team for a second White House term.

O'Leary, her reputation smudged by excessive travel expenses, was "given the clear impression" that Clinton wants her out, one official said.

Meal plan may return to TOC

Senate also debates SATF planning, gives out annual awards

By Raghuram Vadarevu
Collegian Staff

Commuter students enrolled in the Off Campus Meal Plan (OCMP) at the University of Massachusetts may soon be able to eat at the Top of the Campus (TOC) restaurant.

The Undergraduate Student Senate unanimously passed a motion requesting UMass Food Services to reinstate the OCMP last night.

The OCMP is a meal plan offered to on and off campus students who would like to eat at various restaurants off–campus.

"The Top of the Campus restaurant being in a centralized location on campus allows students access to quality food without having to leave campus," said Sen. Bill Ramsey (Commuter Area), the author of the motion.

"A lot of students who utilize the OCMP have expressed concern that it was taken off the TOC," said Ramsey, who added that many students benefit from the OCMP.

According to Ramsey, the program is popular among off– campus students who do not like to cook for themselves.

Ramsey said that he was encouraged by conversations he has had with the manager of Food Services, Roberta Potter.

"She is willing to work with [the Student Senate] on this issue," Ramsey said.

In other Senate legislation, a motion to recognize the Student Activities Trust Fund Planning Committee (SPC) was voted down.

The motion, sponsored by Sen. Jenn Corbett (SW– Kennedy), chair of the Senate Ways and Means Committee, stipulated that the Student Government Association (SGA) acknowledge the SPC "as a body of the Student Activities Trust Fund to recommend long–term planning and ideas," the motion stated.

According to Jeff Coker, SGA Secretary of Finance, it would be impossible for the SGA to monitor the Student Activities Trust Fund.

The SPC has been around for many years, said Coker who spoke for the motion. He said that the SPC was ignored by the SGA since 1991 when the SGA had a lot of internal problems.

Senate Speaker Brian Tirrell relinquished the speakership to speak in opposition of the motion. Tirrell said that the motion would in effect, take away some of the powers of the student Senate. He cited the SGA Constitution and By– Laws which detail the operations of the Undergraduate Senate.

Tirrell, specifically cited sections four and five of the SGA Constitution which stated that "the Senate shall have the power to: review and make recommendations regarding the Student Activities Fund" and "the Senate shall not take an action abridging any of the power delegated it by this Constitution," respectively.

"I didn't feel that the administration or the people appointed by the administration should be affecting the student activities fee," said Tirrell, referring to four administrators who would make up the SPC.

When asked about the outcome of the motion, Coker declined comment.

In other matters, the Senate awarded the "Administrator of the Year" award to vice–Chancellor for Student Affairs Tom Robinson.

The award was given to Robinson because of his support for SATF Relief and donating $15,000 to the Board of Student Businesses on behalf of the Student Affairs office.

His award was brought into question by some senators who charged that Robinson had not done anything on the 1992 ALANA (Asian, Latino, African American, Native American) Agreements that would, among other things, increase the number of persons of color faculty.

The Senate also gave state Representative Ellen Story the "Legislator of the Year" award for her work on the UMass budget increase.

Ballot measures shape different states in some of costliest campaigns ever

By Helen O'Neill
Associated Press

California turned its back on affirmative action. Florida rejected a sugar tax to clean up the Everglades. And pot smokers puffed celebratory joints in California and Arizona after marijuana was legalized for medical purposes.

Across the nation Tuesday, voters decided on ballot measures ranging from securities fraud to logging and leg traps — all of them hot–button issues in their states.

Colorado refused to squeeze property taxes from churches or to enshrine the "inalienable right" of parents into its constitution.

South Carolina clung stubbornly to the blue laws that make it illegal for retail stores to open before 1:30 p.m. on Sundays. And Montana tried to polish its image. In the year when the fugitive Freemen held authorities at bay for 81 days, voters passed a measure that would make it easier to sue people accused of threats and ban the filing of bogus property liens — a favorite tactic of militia groups.

"Ballot measures are all about individuality," says Elaine Stuart, editor of State Government, a magazine published by the Council of State Governments, a nonprofit group in Lexington, Ky. "They are about shaping our identity as individual states." Win or lose, they tend to pave the way for future legislation, and national change.

California's Proposition 209, which bans racial and sex preferences in public hiring, contracting and education, was widely considered the most divisive — and one of the most significant ballot battles around the country.

Both sides invoked the spirit and speeches of the civil rights movement of the 1960s, framing the debate as a vote on the future of discrimination and affirmative action around the country. Supporters argued for a colorblind society, while opponents said the move would derail programs that counter racism and sexism.

The final say will likely shape affirmative action programs nationally — and will probably be decided, not by voters, but in the courts. Both sides filed lawsuits yesterday over the measure — proponents to get it into effect, opponents to get rid of it as unconstitutional.

"No matter what happens, this is only the beginning of what we believe will be a nationwide battle," said Kathy Spillar, a leader of Stop Prop 209.

Controversy wasn't the only hallmark of California ballots. The state also boasted some of the costliest campaigns, spending more than $40 million over a proposal to make it easier to sue for securities fraud. The nation's stock exchanges invested heavily — and successfully — in a campaign to kill it.

Environmental battles also attracted big money. In Florida, $23 million in advertising by sugar companies and farmers helped persuade voters to reject a penny–a–pound sugar tax for Everglades cleanup. Fertilizer runoff has polluted the fabled "River of Grass," but the voters refused an effort to make farmers pay almost half the enormous costs of restoring the wetland.

Maine's proposed ban on clearcutting on 10 million acres of forest land turned into the most expensive referendum in the state's history, with paper companies spending more than $5 million to defeat it.

"The gun that has been pointed at the head of the Maine economy is now uncocked, unloaded and off the table," said a relieved Gov. Angus King, who had warned that the ban could cost thousands of jobs.

Montana's motto, "Oro y plata," gold and silver, became a symbol of that state's big ballot fight, as mining companies warded off stricter wastewater treatment standards.

And in Idaho, actor Bruce Willis lost $85,000 in a failed effort to persuade voters to reverse state's nuclear waste deal with the federal government.

Casinos and other gambling proposals lost out in Ohio, Arkansas, Colorado, Nebraska and Washington. But in Michigan, bolstered by strong support from Detroit Mayor Dennis Archer, voters agreed to three casinos in that city.

Louisiana voters were less sure. Given a unique opportunity to kick out an industry that has riddled the state with scandal, they split their decision in parish–by–parish votes. Six parishes with riverboat casinos voted to keep them, 23 decided to allow it and 14 voted to keep them out; 30 parishes held on to video poker and 34 rejected it.

Dole has no need of the dole

By Tom Raum
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — With one last thumbs up for the public and a round of farewell photos with his staff, Bob Dole moved yesterday into involuntary retirement.

His plans? He didn't say. But he shouldn't have trouble making ends meet. Though he often talked of his humble origins during the campaign, Dole and his wife, Elizabeth, have built a multimillion–dollar cushion.

Dole spent much of the afternoon at his campaign headquarters. Reporters were kept outside, but he was said to be in good spirits as he said his goodbyes and posed for photographs.

"He expects to still maintain a role in public life," said campaign spokesman Nelson Warfield. But when asked just what Dole might do, Warfield replied, "All I would say is, stay tuned."

Last week, Dole said in an interview with David Frost that he might do some work with the disabled if he lost the election. Dole lost the use of his right arm as a result of a World War II injury, and he has only partial use of his left arm.

Throughout his congressional career, he has championed the rights of the disabled. At 73, Dole would have no problem taking it easy for a while if he wants, even making lucrative speeches here and there.

He's a year younger than former President Bush, who has seemed to enjoy the freedom that comes from being out of office and out of the news.

For a man whose family survived the Depression by moving into the basement of their home in Russell, Kan., and renting out the rest of the house, Dole and his wife have done well financially. In fact, Mrs. Dole, who is 60, is due to resume her $200,000–a–year job as president of the American Red Cross in January. She has been on an unpaid leave during the campaign.

Dole is drawing retirement benefits of $107,000 a year after resigning his Senate seat last June 11 to campaign fulltime. During his campaign, he has given his monthly checks to charities. Dole also receives an $18,300–a–year pension from the Army, largely due to his wartime injuries in Italy.

The Doles have combined assets of about $4 million. During his three decades in Congress, Dole — a one–time chairman of the Senate Finance Committee — took in $1.7 million in speechmaking fees and other honoraria, more than any other member of Congress.

Until 1991, senators could pocket their speech fees. Dole put much of his into a retirement account. More recently, both Doles have given much of their speaking fees to charity.

Herzfeld, Schlictmann to speak

By Joseph Fountain
Collegian Staff

Tonight, several prominent speakers will visit the University of Massachusetts to address both the evolution of anthropology and the American judicial system.

The anthropology department is sponsoring a lecture by Michael Herzfeld of Harvard University. Herzfeld has written extensively on the Balkans and was a recent winner of the "Staley Prize," an award for work on anthropology.

His presentation will be entitled, "The European Thinking: Rethinking an Attitude," and will take place at 4 p.m. in Campus Center room 175.

The lecture marks the 25th anniversary of the anthropology department's "European Field Program."

In addition, the legal studies department at UMass will be sponsoring, "An Evening with Jan Schlictmann and Jonathan Harr," who will discuss their book, A Civil Action.

Schlictmann will recount his experiences written in the book as a trial lawyer, representing eight families who suffered death and injuries from groundwater pollution in Woburn, Mass. The suit was filed against W.R. Grace and Beatrice Foods, for poisoning the water supply in the area.

John Brigham, a professor of political science at UMass refers to these controversial cases as "toxic torts."

The book is on the national best seller list and has been optioned as a movie by Robert Redford.

Schlictmann earned his bachelor's degree at UMass in 1973 and his law degree from Cornell.

"The audience will feel the magnetism of both lawyer and the writer," said John Bonsignore, event organizer and professor of legal studies, who was also Schlictmann's UMass advisor.

He added, "Jan Schlictmann did not win many difficult cases by chance, and Jonathan Harr didn't write a best selling book by accident."

The lecture will be held at 7 p.m. in 106 Thompson Hall at UMass.

Stories mesmerize 'Queer Cafe'

JENNIFER JUTRAS / COLLEGIAN

Carrie Ferguson, a local singer and songwriter, performed last night at the Quintessentially Queer Cafe in the Campus Center Graduate Lounge.

By Jamie Sinsheimer
Collegian Staff

Last night in the Campus Center Graduate Lounge on the University of Massachusetts campus, a Quintessentially Queer Cafe was held at 7:30 p.m.

An evening of readings and performances, the Cafe was open to anyone who wanted to perform in any context. The event was sponsored by The Stonewall Center and the UMass Arts Council.

The format of the Cafe included eight performers separated completely in half by a brief ten minute intermission. Aside from the eight performers there was also an emcee of the show. Derick Brown, a senior finance major and also a member of the Speaker's Bureau took the audience through the show with deep passion in his voice and kept them enchanted throughout the whole evening.

The night started off with a little poetry by graduate student Tricia Asklar. Asklar, a Master of Fine Arts (MFA) candidate in poetry, read seven poems all dealing with different issues. The last poem entitled "All Hallow Even," was an intense poem of first love, read with desire and fervor in her voice.

Following the breaking of the ice was another graduate student, Tracy Majka, who is working towards an MFA in Fiction. Recently from Purdue University in Indiana, Majka read half of a short fiction story that she wrote. The piece titled "Fallout" was the same story that gained her admission into UMass.

The story of a young woman at work in a place where she is apparently not happy, slowly dissolves into an emotional piece which involves her losing her job, seeing her mother (who has been absent from her life for six months) and fearing that her mother will find out about her girlfriend who is possibly at home sleeping in her bed. The audience was left to wonder what happened next because the entire story was not read.

The evening then took a different turn when local singer and songwriter Carrie Ferguson sang a few a cappella tunes. The editor of Ella, the Valley's journal of women in music, Ferguson sang songs of past love affairs with women, a song about the planet Jupiter, and another song that helps her deal with nightmares that she often has. Feeling that the last one in particular is sort of an "exorcism, so therapeutically help me heal."

To close off the first half of the Cafe, another MFA candidate in fiction had the opportunity to read her work. Michelle Valois read a short story entitled "Europe on Ten Dollars a Day," an impassioned plea for a lost love. Opening with a packing sequence in which she compares the amount of clothing that she is bringing with her to the amount her estranged lover is bringing; the story flowed and brought the audience along on a journey throughout a mystical city in Europe.

Opening up the second half of the show was David Hanbury. Hanbury presented a solo performance which encompassed monologue and dance. His monologue was an odd theory on alien abduction. While he spoke of his abduction he applied green make–up to his entire face and painted his lips with a dark bloody red lipstick.

Dressed in all black, he rose up from his seat and started to dance to several different tunes inviting the aliens to "take" him. Closing off his piece he did a sequence straight out of the movie Showgirls and ended the entire piece with the simple statement that he repeated — "what?"

Danielle Carriveau, a poet from Arizona, also performed her work in a performance style. She recited her poems with great enthusiasm as though she was acting out a scene from a play. Mesmerized by her voice the audience looked on in anticipation as she spoke.

Two other performers read their work well; Lisa Beskin, a graduate student and Kaolin, a published writer. As the evening continued on and the cafe came to a close Brown thanked the appreciative crowd for attending and the dim lights slowly went up.

GOP wants cooperation with Clinton

By David Espo
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Savoring their renewed majority, Republican congressional leaders spoke optimistically yesterday of cooperation with President Clinton on their agenda of tax cuts and smaller government.

"We don't have to live in a world of confrontation," said Speaker Newt Gingrich.

At the same time, Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott promised a probe into the allegations of Democratic campaign financial misdeeds that Bob Dole raised in his losing bid for the White House.

"We have a responsibility in a variety of ways to take a look at... what appears to be wrongdoing," he said.

Clinton, too, sounded hopeful that he and the GOP Congress could work together. Referring to recent legislation that raised the minimum wage, expanded access to health care and reformed welfare, he said, "If we can somehow recreate for the next four years the spirit that prevailed in the last six weeks of the Congress, we can do great things."

Republicans are expected to take a few weeks to sort out their plans for the Congress that convenes in January, but some elements were clear even before the final votes were counted in Tuesday's undecided congressional races.

In an interview, Gingrich renewed his promise to have a constitutional amendment on term limits as the first substantive issue on the House floor next year.

Lott, at a news conference, suggested a balanced budget amendment to the Constitution might be voted on early, as well. That passed the House in 1995, but failed by a single vote in the Senate, with Clinton lobbying lawmakers to oppose it.

"It looks like we might have the votes to pass it" when the newly elected senators are sworn in, Lott said, although he also predicted that some former Democratic supporters would be under pressure to switch their votes.

Gingrich said he had spoken by telephone with Clinton during the day, and the GOP leaders "want to sit down with him" next week before they begin mapping their agenda.

"It is the American system that after the election you figure out how to get things done," said the Georgia Republican, who spoke harshly of Clinton during the campaign.

Lott will be presiding over a strengthened GOP majority in the Senate beginning next year. With an Oregon race still unsettled, Republicans will have at least 54 seats, one more than in the expiring Congress. That likely will translate into larger majorities on some or all committees, giving the GOP a freer hand in drafting legislation.

In the House, Republicans will have roughly 10 fewer seats than last time, with the final tally awaiting the outcome of six races too close to call and three runoffs set for Dec. 10 in Texas. It marked the first time in 66 years that Republicans had held onto a House majority. Even so, the loss of a few seats is likely to strengthen the hand of moderates in both political parties — the Republicans who want to sand down the sharper edges of their own party's agenda and the Democrats who are willing to reach across the aisle on key issues.

"The moderate-conservative wings of both parties are going to be in a very good position," said Rep. Charles Stenholm of Texas, a prominent conservative Democrat.

Rep. Christopher Shays, a moderate Republican from Connecticut, agreed. The voters decided on Tuesday that "right of center is fine, far right isn't," he said.

Indeed, the political division within the government seemed to reflect the popular mood. Election Day interviews with voters leaving their polling place showed the country was split evenly on a question of whether they trusted Congress or the president to do what's best for the country.

Congressional Democrats, who fell short in their bid to regain the House, sought solace in the outcome. "I think it's incumbent now on the Republicans and on us to try to reach bipartisan, sensible solutions to the budget, campaign finance reform... and every day problems people face," said Democratic Leader Richard Gephardt of Missouri. Aides said Gephardt would seek another term in his leadership role.

In the Senate, Democratic Leader Tom Daschle said in a statement, "If there's a mandate in this election, it's a mandate for moderation and bipartisan cooperation."

Republicans spoke of cooperation, but distinctly on their terms. The two sides can work together. Gingrich said, as long as the president pursues the program that won him re-election, "which, after all, was conservative."

House Majority Leader Dick Armey was more barbed in his comments, saying that a compromise on Medicare — a major issue in the campaign — might even be possible.

"He certainly has no need to do any political work in this year, so we can get down to the policy issues that are before us, and we ought to be able to work together on that," said Armey.

Torkildsen for recount against Tierney

By Richard Lorant
Associated Press

BOSTON — John F. Tierney dubbed himself "Landslide Tierney" yesterday.

He was only kidding.

Unofficial results showed Tierney beating two-term Republican Rep. Peter G. Torkildsen by 582 votes out of more than 275,000 cast Tuesday in the 6th Congressional District. Torkildsen was demanding a recount.

Massachusetts other Republican congressman, Peter I. Blute, lost to Worcester Democrat Jim McGovern in the 3rd District. McGovern had 55 percent of the vote to Blute's 44 percent in unofficial returns.

"John's jokingly calling himself 'Landslide Tierney,'" said Tierney's campaign manager, Sarah Nathan. But aides answering the phone at his Salem headquarters called him "Congressman-elect Tierney."

"We're not celebrating. We're preparing ourselves to go to Congress and work," Tierney said at a news conference yesterday. Torkildsen, meanwhile, huddled with lawyers most of the day to decide whether he would argue for a district-wide recount or contest the votes in individual precincts. He requested recount forms from the secretary of state's office and notified city and town clerks of his intentions.

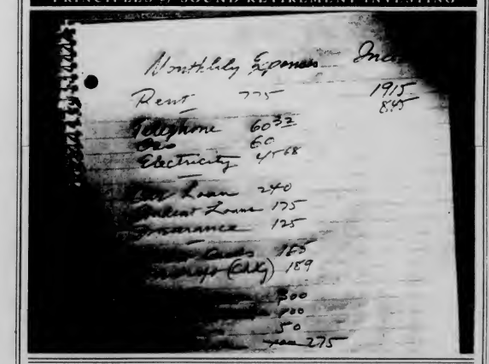
"We will definitely have a recount of some type," he said in a telephone interview. "It's very much within reach."

A full recount would take weeks.

Torkildsen and his supporters must get 500 signatures of district residents who were registered to vote in the election and submit them to town clerks by Nov. 15 for the signatures to be certified as valid.

Then the petitions must be filed with the secretary of state before Nov. 20 and checked again before a recount can be scheduled. Some overseas absentee ballots could still come in, also, election officials said.

If Tierney's victory holds, it will be the first time in a regular election that Massachusetts voters send an all-Democratic delegation to Washington. In 1991, a special election after the death of Republican Rep. Silvio Conte left the state's Republicans without a congressional voice for a year.



In the state's eight remaining House races, Democrats came out on top Tuesday and U.S. Sen. John Kerry won re-election by a substantial margin.

"It's not just Massachusetts," Torkildsen said. "Republicans took a bath throughout New England. It's a Democratic monsoon. I'm just glad I'm still standing."

Re-elected were Democrats Barney Frank of Newton, Joseph P. Kennedy II and J. Joseph Moakley of Boston, Edward Markey of Malden, John Olver of Amherst and Richard Neal of Springfield.

Although the Torkildsen-Tierney race was closest, it wasn't the biggest surprise, according to Lou DiNatale, a Democratic political consultant and fellow in public policy at the University of Massachusetts at Boston.

PRINCIPLES of SOUND RETIREMENT INVESTING

IRONICALLY, THE TIME TO START SAVING FOR RETIREMENT IS WHEN IT LOOKS LIKE YOU CAN LEAST AFFORD IT.

Can't afford to save for retirement? The truth is, you can't afford not to. Not when you realize that your retirement can last 20 to 30 years or more. You'll want to live at least as comfortably then as you do now. And that takes planning.

By starting to save now, you can take advantage of tax deferral and give your money time to compound and grow. Consider this: Set aside just $100 each month beginning at age 30 and you can accumulate over $172,109* by the time you reach age 65. But wait ten years and you'll have to budget $219 each month to reach the same goal.

Even if you're not counting the years to retirement, you can count on TIAA-CREF to help you build the future you deserve – with flexible retirement and tax-deferred annuity plans, a diverse portfolio of investment choices, and a record of personal service that spans 75 years.

Over 1.8 million people in education and research put TIAA-CREF at the top of their list for retirement planning. Why not join them?

Call today and learn how simple it is to build a secure tomorrow when you have time and TIAA-CREF working on your side.

Nice Jersey... is it new?

C. Taylor Connor

New Jersey.

The landmass that's its own set-up and punchline to most of us. The only state where football players can garner first down yardage on top of Jimmy Hoffa's remains. The armpit that airs itself out upon Atlantic Ocean waters.

Jersey residents have heard all the stereotypes before, and they're tired of it. They're well aware that half of their homeland smells as fishy as a Dole victory would have. They know that 95 percent of the total square mileage of the Garden State is highway. They've grown up with the knowledge that when they reveal their state of origin, people from other states will make that face — that damned face.

However, the majority of those who strip mine Jersey for humor gems don't have the right to do so. It's on the books.

In the landmark, yet widely unknown, 1946 Hoboken Accords, it is stated that citizens of the United States who reside outside of states bordering New Jersey are in violation of federal code should they mock the residents or state of New Jersey.

Luckily, I am a native Philadelphian, so I can say whatever the hell I like — but, more often than not, I choose not to engage in such petty and pathetic behavior.

That said, I now choose to engage in such petty and pathetic behavior, but not without just cause. It's high time non-Jersey residents learned the essentials about the place where Sinatra's career was born, and competing lounge singers met with unfortunate "accidents" as a result.

The first thing you'll need to know is how to spot Jersey- raised students on campus, the easiest means being, vehicular identification.

Check the parking lots of any fraternity or sorority. There should be a plethora of late-model Jeeps (both Wrangler and Cherokee) and sports cars. Yearning for acceptance and nouveau-riche material, neuroticisms cross paths, leading Jerseyites to try to impress their new friends at school, much like the kid at the elementary level who always had the latest Voltron toy.

Another identifying factor would be those peculiar incidents when a car pulls up behind you, pointlessly cuts you off, and then proceeds to drive slower than you once in front of you. Chances are the license plate will be from the Garden State.

This strange habit is derived from Jerseyan forays into nearby major metropoles like Philadelphia and New York. Fascinated by the stop-start gridlock rhythm of actual cities, New Jersey residents emulate the behavior to the point of inanity wherever they drive, regardless of traffic flow.

While on the topic, it is of vital importance to even the most casual acquaintances of those who say they're from the City of Brotherly Love or the Big Apple to grill these people with one simple question:

"What part of Philly/NYC are you from?"

There are three possible results: "I'm actually from South Jersey," (the pseudo-Philadelphian response); "I'm actually from North Jersey" (the pseudo-New Yorker response); or acute sweating, folowed by projectile vomiting, and finally, a messy spontaneous combustion (the Central Jersey response).

This tragic last response occurs, since unlike the little Asian kid, Short Round (masterfully played by the soon-to- be star of "The Goonies" and underrated child thespian Ke Huy Quan), in the second Indiana Jones flick, this region has no hero (read: city) to which they can turn.

It's sad to say that even beloved sons Frank Sinatra and Bruce Springsteen have taken steps to erase their Jersey lineage. The former has been crooning "New York, New York" for years, while the latter won an Oscar for mumbling about the "Streets of Philadelphia."

And look what happened to the career of pivotal hair band (if that isn't the oxymoronic phrase of the decade) and proud Jersey natives Bon Jovi once they had the unprecedented audacity at the pinnacle of their success to name their Slippery When Wet follow-up after their home state.

Their sales continue to drop as I write this piece.

Hell, even Fugees management has probably advised them to mention as little as possible where they come from. You will not see Lauryn Hill and crew on the cover of a disc entitled Jersey... Represent! unless they have the overwhelming desire to end up 15 years from now on embarrassing rap compilation infomercials with Hammer, Vanilla Ice and Snow.

I have always been and will always be a strong proponent of remaining true to who and what you are. Thus, I befriend Jerseyolians freely and openly.

And although there isn't much great to say on behalf of Jersey, it does have several positive attributes: beaches, Atlantic City, the Giants and lets...

Well, at least you can get a tan and gamble.

Between boyhood and manhood

Bob Dunn

It's over.

Thank God. I don't think I could have taken much more campaigning. I mean, I'm as much of a political junkie as anyone but there comes a point where indulgence in any vice turns to overindulgence and nectar turns to poison, and we reached that point about three months ago. This campaign has dragged on so long it seems like Strom Thurmond still had to pay full price at the movies when it started.

It seems like the gap between political campaigns has grown shorter than the respite between NBA seasons, so in celebration of this slight window of opportunity, I've decided to address a topic almost completely unrelated to politics. It's the long sought after and largely unknown third stage of male development and the one for which my testosterone-laced brethren draw the most ire for. It's guyhood.

Guyhood is the middle and therefore transitional stage in the development of the male. It begins with boyhood, goes through guyhood and then on to manhood. It would be nice if we could go straight to manhood, but that can't and won't happen. Just as Luke Skywalker had to confront and defeat Darth Vader (Oedipal references aside) in order to become a Jedi, boys must confront and defeat their "inner guy" in order to become men.

The problem is guyhood, like the "dark side," is really tempting. Don't think that inside every austere, introspective, sensitive man out there, there isn't a raging urge to drink bad beer from a jug, watch sports incessantly, eat cereal, tell raunchy jokes, scratch in socially suspect areas, go into great detail about sexual fantasies with any number of celebrities all from the comfort of La-z-boys with remote controls built into the armrests arranged in a giant semi-circle around a large screen home theater system with THX surround sound and a full library of Playstation games. The enlightened few recognize the temptation, deal with it, sublimate it and rise above it. The unlucky ones (let's call them the "lost boars") wallow in it, faced with the terrifying prospect of the summation of their wit and wisdom being handed down from the likes of Andrew "Dice" Clay.

Probably the easiest basis for comparison is to use celebrity models. For example, Arnold Schwarzenegger is a guy, Harrison Ford is a man. Jim Carrey, guy. Sean Connery, man. The Baldwin brothers and the Kennedy males, guys.

Then of course there are the fringe players, those who are in a transitional state between stages. For example both Paul Reiser and Eddie Murphy have strong guy leanings, but they're trying hard.

So there's the celebrity model, but what about real life? How are you supposed to spot a guy in your day-to-day dealing with the Y-chromosomed? It's easier than you might think. A good place to start is to ask a male to name a celebrity that they find attractive. If their first, gut-response answer falls along the lines of Anna Nicole Smith, Pamela Anderson, Jenny McCarthy, etc. chances are you're dealing with a die-hard guy. If a male thinks that Angel Heart was a great film because of, not in spite of, Lisa Bonet's appearance, that's a sure sign of guyness.

Guys will pass gas in mixed company and find it funny. Parenthetically, men find farts amusing too, but they'll have enough tact to feign embarrassment if caught. Guys will usually have more than two posters featuring sports figures in their rooms and think that the only thing ERA stands for is earned run average.

Any room, cave or dwelling which features cut-out photos of women from fashion magazines or swimsuit issues is an absolute den of guyness.

Even true-blue men, however, still will display shades of guyness in various, and usually innocuous ways. You can, for example, find a male who will spend an afternoon quietly reading Hemingway and then spend his evening cheering and applauding during Independence Day when everything blows up, simply because everything blows up. Guys dig destruction.

So, what to do? How are we supposed to get guys to come out of their iron johns, newspapers in hand, long enough to count themselves among the rest of polite society? Simple. Accept them. No one would think to scold a child for being "childish" one shouldn't berate a guy for being "guyish." It's a necessary, albeit awkward stage. With help, education and an inordinate amount of patience, guys can help see the light. The path to the top of the mountain is paved with old copies of Sports Illustrated, and pictures that were packed around the articles in Playboy, but it is there, it can be traversed as long as two simple things are remembered.

One, our guy sides, however subtle, need to be indulged every now and then. For example, is it too much to ask to let us watch Die Hard again?

Two, don't demand we admit when we're wrong. Men, evolved as they are, still retain that ancestral anomaly. That genetic quirk that led the caveguys to believe that the size of their club actually mattered when it came to catching dinner. We can't and won't admit we're wrong even when faced with an O.J.-sized mountain of evidence against us.

Of course, I could be slightly less than completely correct about all of this. Hey, I'm trying.

Left lane closed for construction

Mike Elliott

The most deft election analysis is always overheard in the most unlikely places — this time, it was in line at Earthfood's.

"The communists are becoming more like the Democrats, and the Democrats are becoming more like the Republicans," said the woman behind me, most likely, not a enthusiastic Clinton supporter.

While the Communist Party USA, is in no position to fill the vacuum which the "New Democratic" party has left in Congress, the comment is correct in highlighting the dilemma now facing the American Left — the '90s leave them without a party.

Clinton, despite himself, is no conservative. His record, however, indicates anything but consistency; and his neo- liberal agenda has, in many cases, contradicted his calls for a just "new world order."

At home, the liberal wing of the Democratic party has grown increasingly disillusioned with their President — for good reason. He has abandoned old-school New Deal Democratic policies (welfare reform), asserted a profit oriented foreign policy and never materialized as a strong advocate for social justice, as many had speculated before his election (remember his anti-gay marriage stance).

Yet, he is popular — as are his politics, which have moved increasingly towards a conservative center. While Clinton insisted on a "campaign of issues," it is obvious which "issues" he wanted to avoid.

Neither Clinton or the Republicans have any interest in significantly reducing the size of the federal government. Both have too much at stake. They do have an interest, however, in controlling the boundaries of the debate over Washington's bureaucratic future, as the Republicans did when they seized upon welfare reform.

Forced to argue on someone else's terms, the not-so- courageous President capitulated by agreeing to eliminate a program which costs less than the construction of a half- dozen B-2 bombers.

In many cases, the political battle is over the moment a bill hits the floor of the Senate or the House of Representatives. Whatever party sets the parameters of debate will most likely prevail in the end.

This again, is not good news for the Left. Clinton foreign policy takes for granted Americanized notions of economic development, free markets and globalized competition.

It is immensely difficult to argue for a more equitable global economic structure using the language and concepts of those who simply want to reap as much profits from it as possible.

From NAFTA to GATT to his renewed endorsement of U.S.-backed international credit institutions (IMF and World Bank), Clinton has clearly demonstrated little patience for those whom argue against the American development model.

His support of the Helms-Burton Act — yet another attempt to punish Cuba for persevering under Castro for three decades, is a prime example of Clinton's take-no- prisoners neo-liberal politics.

All is not lost, however. Even without the Democrats, the Left does have a ally in the social realities Clinton ignores. How long will it take before the country is forced to realize that earning a decent living as a single parent while raising a child is an overwhelming struggle from the start?

And from the factories in Indonesia and Mexico where American products are made at little cost (benefiting the consumers here, not the workers there), is it not now the time to start counting the days before the masses decide they would rather not assemble computers at 50 cents an hour?

Clinton, following his old lefty friends, will eventually take notice.

Whose representative government?

Daniel E. Levenson

No bloody bodies lie in streets, no flames fill the night air, no angry mobs choke the roads.

As I watched the peaceful transfer of power in America tonight, these thoughts filled my mind.

In many other countries around the world, the change of leaders or law is a dangerous violent thing. Often those who sit in the seat of power are unwilling to give up their place at the world's table.

In many of these places what determines who will become head of state, is not the ability to lead, but the ability to assert and maintain Machiavellian control over the population.

That's not to say that American politics have bloodless beginnings. Without the Revolutionary War or the Civil War, the structure of United States politics would most likely not exist as we know it today.

The purpose of having a system of government that allows not only for a peaceful transition of leadership, but for the relatively orderly acceptance and rejection of legislation, is to insure the security and continuance of our nation.

While many argue that the Electoral College does not accurately represent the choice of the American people, it is doubtful that it will ever change. As one person pointed out to me earlier today, if the winner were based on the popular vote, third party candidates would have a much better chance of being elected. Obviously this would be to the disadvantage of both the Republican and Democratic parties, since it would give outside candidates a distinct edge.

Now the 1996 election is over, and we have chosen Bill Clinton to lead our country for another four years. He has done some good things in the past, and in the future, his leadership will allow him to continue programs he began in his last term.

But I can't help but wonder if the election of Clinton represents the voters' fear of what Dole and a Republican Congress would have done to the country, and not necessarily a desire to see Clinton retain office.

However, there are several advantages to Clinton winning a second term, both personally, and for the country.

As many in the media have commented, a second term is the time when a president helps to define the legacy that they will leave behind. He will now have time to reflect on the past four years and apply what he has learned to the next four.

Speculation on what the Dole years would have been like is something that I don't really like to think about. I can't imagine the catastrophic consequences of a Dole White House. And it's not because I don't think he's smart or enough or that he's too old for the job.

The reason I am glad that Clinton won is simple — in my opinion, the Republican party, no matter how many within their ranks are willing to sway to the left, by and large, does not represent the majority of the American Public.

While I have no doubt that many, if not all, politicians are sometimes subject to the influence of big corporations and private industry, it is my belief that the Republican party is not only subject to their influence, but in fact, represents that faction.

They are a party whose constituents are not the American public, but the American private.

Just as the Republicans paint a clear portrait of the people they represent, the Democrats' artistic representation falls somewhere between interpretive modern art and a wall covered with fifth graders' finger paintings. The ideas are in there, somewhere, they're just not that easy to see.

And even when the ideology of the party is sitting in plain view, the reasons behind it are sometimes hard to understand. There is a definite trend towards the abandonment of blind support of party views, and more of a move towards moderate courses of action that actually reflect what the people want to see.

The American political system is a ship set sail in stormy seas. Filled to the top with both parties, as the water fills the hull, all the rats scurry to the middle so that neither group will be the one to tip the boat. Unfortunately for the American public watching this comedy of errors, the chances of a happy ending don't look too good.

As the people of this country move forward I cannot help but be left with a strange feeling that the politicians are moving backwards, or at the very least, standing still.

Two different worlds

Government Health Warning: This area has been declared an election-free zone by the Surgeon General's office. Those seeking solace from post-election blues should read another column.

I had a busy day on Saturday. Got up at 12 p.m., walked down to catch the second half of the football game, hit the D.C., went to the hockey game, went to a party and by the time I got home it was Sunday. It was a good day. I didn't solve the problems of world hunger or poverty, and it certainly won't go down in the history books as the best Saturday on record, but I had fun. My girlfriend Danielle had a busy day too. She got married.

It's all a little bit much for me really. I mean I've seen friends get married before, I've been to weddings, it's not like I've just been introduced to the concept of marriage. And I like marriage, it looks like a good thing. I'm sure that if you shop around and get the best deal, it can be a pretty good way to spend your life. So what's the big deal? Danielle's my friend, she loves her man, they're made for one another and chances are they'll have a wonderful life together enjoying the spoils of marital bliss.

The big deal is I grew up with this girl. She's not some friend from work who's ten years older than me, or a distant cousin who lives in the country — I've seen these people get married before and it's had absolutely no effect on me whatsoever. Danielle's different though. I remember when we used to hide out at the train station, breaking what our girls' school had instituted as the 11th commandment (Thou shalt not smoke in school uniform). Pretty soon we'd graduated to wagging school to visit our boyfriends and spend weekends getting drunk and sneaking into night clubs. Then, soon enough, she went off to work and I went to university.

Our lives had never been terribly similar but they'd never really been that different either. Up until last Saturday anyway. At 12 p.m., as I was struggling with the shower in hangover-denial mode. Danielle, in a little church in suburban Sydney, was taking her vows. By the time I'd reached the football stadium, the guests at her reception would have been toasting the bride and groom. And now as I sit here, panicking over essays I haven't written and wondering how on earth I'll ever have the money to go to Montreal at Thanksgiving, Danielle, a married woman, is honeymooning in Queensland, Australia's sunshine state.

So naturally all this wedding business has got me to thinking about myself. Will I get married? Do I want to get married? Will there be anyone I want to marry? Will anyone want to marry me? If I do get married will I wear white? And if I do wear white how will I avoid wearing white high-heels?

The first question is rather silly. Will I get married? Who knows, it's kind of dependent on the answers to the other questions. Do I want to get married isn't much better. Surely that depends on my next questions, will there be anyone I want to marry and will anyone want to marry me. I pondered this as I watched the magnificent display of testosterone that is college football and hockey on Saturday. I looked around the stands for potential suitors. Not too much talent there at either venue I'm afraid. So I turned my attention to the field and while I managed to witness some amazing displays of athleticism, courage and honour, I decided it was probably a bit risky to try and pick a partner from a group of men who are all wearing football or hockey helmets.

I mentioned the dilemma of the helmet-covered sportsmen to my friend sitting with me and she kindly directed my attention to those three guys from the marching band who hang around near the goal area at the footy and let off canons and things. At first I thought she was joking but the more I looked the better it got. There were no helmets, they already had suits, they knew how to dance and more importantly they looked like a bit of fun. I had not even spoken to them but already they had passed four of the most important areas of consideration. They had to be in with a chance. Unfortunately, as I ran down to speak with them after the game, an enormous band of groupies swept them away and out of the stadium. So despite all their potential they failed one of the most vital areas, that of availability.

However, it is reassuring to know that all is not lost. The marriage thing doesn't seem as complicated to me as it did before, so maybe Danielle getting married was a good thing after all.

I'm still worried about the white high-heels though. The last thing you want on your wedding day is a visit from the fashion police. I wonder if I'd look silly walking down the aisle in Nikes?

TV FROM THE OTHER SIDE

Lisa Oliveri

It's Friday night and you're wondering what to do. There are the obvious choices — the overcrowded bar scene, the loud dance club or perhaps you could catch the latest flick. Maybe you could grab some friends and go to a party. Or you could do what countless folks have already discovered — watch an episode of the "X-Files".

Though it has recently been moved to Sunday nights, the "X-Files" is just one of many television shows that have garnered quite a cult following.

If you were to look in the personal sections of a major metropolitan newspaper, such as The Boston Phoenix, you may see an ad calling out to "X-Philes," fans of the show, to view the "X-Files" together. Heck, it's almost like a giant X- Phile singles scene.

On the World Wide Web, countless pages have been devoted to television shows. Home pages for the "X-Files," "Star Trek," "Sliders," "Seinfeld" and even "Friends" exist. Even usenet groups are devoted to particular shows.

There are even conventions devoted to television shows, where fans can buy memorabilia, trading cards and even speak to some of the stars and creators. These conventions serve as a place where fans can go and meet and chat with other fans.

So what makes people form these cults around television shows?

It starts when many people start watching a certain show, said "Star Trek" fan, K.C. Laxton, a computer science/psychology/pre-med major. Then they tell others

THE EVOLUTION OF TELEVISION

Seema Gangatirkar

There used to be a time when television was friendly, classy and good humored. And if you can think of television as a reflection of the changes in society, you can chart the evolution of attitudes and manners.

Television started out with traditional family sitcoms. Mary Tyler Moore, who got her career started as Laura on "The Dick Van Dyke Show," was the devoted and supported wife and mother — the typical role for her time. She was married to working woman Rob Petrie, who had a respectable job as a writer. Moore was the perfect housewife of the 1950s and 60s. She was always dressed to the nines, in the latest fashions, and had dinner on the table by the time her husband got home from work. Moore's character was the epitome of elegance and good humor.

Despite the two families' radically different roles, Moore and Petrie maintained this sense of equality. Petrie was no chauvinist pig. There was nothing degrading about Moore's character. She was not the other shows that aired during the same time period. Unlike Moore, the other 20 years, our expectations have changed. Moore was a self-sufficient woman, who had a career and was respected by her husband. Petrie was no wimp. He was acceptable to Moore's character, and what is acceptable to us today, is not acceptable to CBS. When Moore appeared on "Dick Van Dyke" wearing Capri pants, the highest a CBS threw a collective fit. These days, Barbarella's bare midriff is considered tame. Looking back at the "Dick Van Dyke Show" reruns, Rob and Laura (though married with children) slept in separate beds. They exchanged the occasional chaste kiss or hug. Now it's not uncommon to turn on television and see blatant sex or sexual innuendo.

A prime example of this trend is "Friends." NBC's runaway hit sitcom can't seem to keep its humor out of the bedroom. The gentle and witty humor of the past has evaporated into smut between the sheets.

What it boils down to is that sex sells.

No longer does television depend on traditional family values to entice viewers. We have come to expect more. The more racy the more violent, the more provocative — the more we'll watch.

Nexcuse me if I don't get it myself, but I don't see how this is progress. If you look at the state of television today, you could see it as a commentary on society. Television broke down the barriers, making formerly taboo subjects more accessible.

"L.A. Law" was the first television show to feature two women kissing. At the time, the kiss between actresses Michele Greene and Amanda Donohoe provoked intense controversy. Would advertisers pull out? Would NBC allow the episode to run?

In the end, the kiss was broadcast, pushing the standards of what was acceptable a bit further. Following in "L.A. Law's" wake, "Roseanne" broadcast a kiss between Roseanne and guest star Marcel Hemingway.

The most recent controversy, though, is over "Ellen." Rumors have been flying throughout the season that Ellen Degeneres' self-described character will come out as a lesbian. While Degeneres has been deflecting rumors with cute as a button, sayings that Ellen will discover if she is Lebanese, there has been a real fear that advertisers will be unable to handle a gay character in a lead role.

The role of advertisers in television is one that cannot be ignored. The idea that gay characters can only be tolerated as

CARTOONS, NOW AND THEN

Adam Levine

Remember the days of innocent youth when what was on television was perhaps the most important aspect of life? This was especially so on Saturday mornings, when millions of kids throughout America would wake up at the crack of dawn and sneak downstairs to the living room. Once there, the sibling rivalries erupted as children would start fighting over the remote control. After all, Saturday morning cartoons were every kid's most essential part of the weekend and no big brother could sacrifice "Superfriends" so his little sister could watch "Jem."

This is a familiar scenario to all of us who grew up watching television. To look back now, a sense of shame could overtake you — but there should be no embarrassment about such an important part of our youth.

Today most of us just sleep through Saturday mornings and although cartoons may still be fun, for the most part they are a nostalgic reminder of days long gone. The role cartoons play in the social progression of television is however, a fascinating study.

All those years we were mindlessly entertained, did we really stop to notice the messages that were being transcended from the screen to inside our fragile minds?

Cartoons have mocked everything from family structures to war, violence to love, and practically all things in between. As kids we never paid much attention to the meanings behind them. Who can not recall the sense of amazement when you first heard that the Smurfs advocated communism?

Now that we are older, we can take a look back in amazement on how manipulated we may have been by those funny animals, superheroes and prehistoric construction workers.

At the root of the cartoon is the superhero and the talking animal. First of all, the concept of the superhero is rather straight forward in its symbolism.

Good and evil are not abstract or metaphoric, but rather concise representations that crime and dishonesty are not acceptable behaviors and, if you choose such actions, you will be punished. Today, superheroes appear quite differently.

"The Adventures of Batman and Robin" depict the caped crusader as a

WHY I WATCH TOO MUCH TV

Jeremy Brothers

Some people get it into their heads in their "college years" that they're either too busy to, or above, watching television. It's only practice for when they become adults who say they only watch PBS, mind you, but I hear it's fun for them.

What are they missing? Amidst the barrage of ads and the even more persuasive infomercials, one can glean a few fun bits from the TV. The secret isn't limiting your viewing hours... No! The secret is to watch as much TV as your brain will allow. Only then can we understand what's still good about the box.

Always ready to sacrifice myself to the greater good, I decided to use one of my precious weekdays off to sit in front of the TV and try to find a few reasons for wankers to tune into TV.

1) It's free (Or nearly so). Once you plop down that initial sum for an actual set, all you need is some electricity to get something on your screen. Go to a hardcore show, go to a movie, whatever you do you're going to pay some amount of money. Fortunately, we live in an area where cinemas are cheap (especially for students.) But on a purely economic level, TV can't be beat.

2) Reruns. I don't know where I was the first time the "V" was on, but whoo-weeee am I hooked now!

There is a plethora of quality shows that ooze from various syndicators and cable networks. Younger generations have rarely been able to appreciate "Dallas" or "The Mary Tyler Moore Show" beyond kitsch value, but there's a reason why these shows were so successful to begin with. Experiencing J.R. Ewing's treachery, or learning to understand why Mary has never thrown a good party, don't have to be a delight of days gone by. Make the discovery for yourself.

3) Keeping up with fads. This goes beyond seeing what, as my grandmother would call "the kids," are doing nowadays. I know it's cliche to refer to television as a cultural barometer, but I'll say it again.

and pretty soon it becomes a main event. He equated certain shows to the Super Bowl — watching them becomes a main event.

Laxton has been a "Star Trek" fan for over 10 years. He's watched the show since the "Star Trek: The Next Generation" first came on the air.

"It's a good show," said Laxton. "It's pretty much the only show I watch."

A few years ago, Laxton attended one of the many "Star Trek" conventions held in this area. And while he really enjoyed it, he said that he probably wouldn't go out of his way to attend again.

"A friend of mine had tickets," said Laxton. "It was neat, but not something I felt the need to go to.

"I love the show, I try my best to watch it," he said. "But I wouldn't devote my life to it."

However, Laxton does not share the same sentiments about the "X-Files." He said that he only watched it once, but was extremely bored by it.

But David Duchovny and Gillian Anderson must be doing something right. The "X-Files" experienced such a recent surge in popularity that there are collectible video tapes, trading cards and comic books now marketed to fans. There is also a series of novels based on the show.

If you attend Washington University, you could enroll in a class that studies that paranormal activity presented in the "X-Files." Yes, the show has that big of an influence.

Part of the appeal of the "X-Files" is the bizarre storylines that deal with the gruesome and the macabre, the weird and the chilling.

One viewer of the show, Jen Zapatka, describes the "X- Files" as, "A new approach to frightening the hell out of people.

"It's scary, but not like the average, everyday plot like in horror movies," Zapatka said. "It's intriguing for people with intellectual minds."

Like "Star Trek," the plot of the "X-Files" revolves around different characters, but at the same time carries an underlying theme throughout the show. They often showcase reoccurring characters and present conspiracy theories, giving X-Philes plenty of discussion material for convention and nighttime gatherings.

"I watch it for the creative story line different from everyday life," said Nancy Cohen, a senior business major.

No matter what prompts people to watch these shows, they've developed a strong following that will most likely continue in the future.

terrifying vigilante and the product of a harsh and misunderstood world. Although one can still identify Batman as a hero, it is impossible to deny that modern day television is far less innocent than before.

As in the case of cartoons like Bugs Bunny and Daffy Duck, the opposite reactions seem to have occurred. The Warner Brothers cartoons from the '30s to '50s, which were still shown during our youth, were very political.

These cartoons were filled with symbolisms of World War Two and the Cold War. There were also descriptions of poverty with a hobo as the cartoon's protagonist. The newer Warner Brothers' shows are far less controversial due to the context of the time period.

"Animaniacs" and "Tiny Toons" target a more cult audience and are filled with subtle dark humor. One aspect of these shows which has not changed over time is how the characters are invincible to death. This has become a trademark of cartoons in general. How can Wile E. Coyote fall off cliffs and fully recuperate? This is one way in which cartoons have gained their popularity in testing the boundaries of reality and fantasy.

The other major evolution in cartoons is their representation of family values. Today's shows like "The Simpsons," are a far leap from the traditional "Flintstones" and "Jetsons."

As television must adhere to new generations, cartoons must also follow in the example. Cartoons have also progressed to a less sexist nature. Marge Simpson is treated with far more respect as a women than Jane Jetson ever was. There has however, always been sexual undertones throughout cartoon history whether it is particular jokes or the costumes of Wonder Women or She-Ra.

Cartoons, like any other television format, must remain loyal to what popular culture wishes to view. The difference with cartoons is that they must remain youth-oriented but also be timeless so that adults can also enjoy their humor and excitement.

Television is a cultural barometer. Case in point: election results were delivered to us Tuesday night with our normally respectable anchorpersons making asses of themselves, speaking in techno-jargon and reporting from "cyber-sets" and "virtual- reality chambers." Instead of making people feel more comfortable around technology, they're making it seem more terrifying when we all know that Dan Rather doesn't know his "http address" from his elbow.

4) Comedy Central and Fox. There's something wonderful about a network that has no chance of being No. 1. Comedy Central goes beyond showing incessant reruns of hilarious shows like "The Kids in the Hall" and "Absolutely Fabulous" by airing quality first-run shows like "Politically Incorrect" and "Dr. Katz, Professional Therapist." Across the dial, while Fox continues to run the much-lauded "The X- Files," this season they launched the delightfully morose "Millennium," from "The X-Files" creator Chris Carter. Tapping into the fad of all this "Millenial Prophet" crap, this new show features a huntcr of serial-killers who are being driven to kill with the year 2000 approaching.

5) Cold Pork. Nothing can beat a heaping plate of cold pork. Oops, wrong list.

6) MTV's "Real World" and "Road Rules." You probably know the drill by now, "Seven strangers, picked to live in a loft, to have their lives taped... blah, blah, blah..." Simply written off as a cross between cinema verite and a voyeuristic wet dream, these two shows have tapped into something far more exciting than these simple buzzwords. People don't want to watch anymore, people want to be watched on these shows. I, for a few brief moments, was one of them. All that these shows want from their applicants is a few questions answered truthfully and a 10 minute video of you talking to the camera. Somewhere between "How important is sex to you?" and "Are you religious?," I bugged out. I realized that I wasn't ready to have my grandparents see me talking about my sex life (or lack thereof...) to a techno beat playing in the background.

supporting or minor characters because of a potential loss in advertising revenues is an indirect form of censorship.

There is much that television can do to push issues to the forefront. Yet there is little or no impetus to do so while the quality and content of a television show depends on Proctor & Gamble, Coca-Cola and other major companies.

Another disturbing trend in television is the emergence of talk shows. Nothing broadcasts the degradation of television and societal values more than the trash fest that occupies valuable air time.

There is a whole parade of talk show hosts, including Jenny Jones, Charles Perez, Sally Jessy Raphael and Jerry Springer, who manage to dredge up the weirdest elements of humanity. Topics like "I'm in love with my boyfriend's mother," or "Surprise, I'm really a man," are common fodder for television's bottom rung.

Each show parades out a guest, berates the guest in front of a national audience and then proceeds to deliver some sanctimonious advice from some magazine editor who once wrote a column on the topic on hand.

And depending on the subject, appearing on a talk show can be a humiliating experience. Probably the best example of talk out of control is the "Jenny Jones Show."

On a never-aired show about same sex secret crushes, Scott Amedure confessed to Jonathan Schmitz that he had a crush on him. Schmitz was so traumatized by the experience, that he shot and killed Amedure three days later.

Currently, Schmitz is on trial for the March 1995 shooting and the whole question of how "The Jenny Jones Show" handled both guests and topics is under close scrutiny.

The fact that television — instead of being used as an informative forum to push issues such as tolerance of homosexuality — is subservient to viewers and advertisers, serving up trash on a platter and ignoring matters of true substance.

Instead, talk shows trivialize and sensationalize the issues, thus contributing to the degeneration of television as an informative and reliable media source.

With all of its imperfections, television still remains one of the leading sources of information. For some people, it is the only outlet from which they learn about the world and its attitude.

For that reason, television needs to become more responsible and more reliable. There ought to be more of a drive to create a medium that is more representative of American culture and diversity and yet, be able to respect the traditional values that once characterized good television.

Tia Carrere and Jon Lovitz receive a poor report card in High School High.

Shaky report card for High School

By Jeremy Brothers
Collegian Staff

HIGH SCHOOL HIGH
Directed by Hart Bochner
with Jon Lovitz, Tia Carrere, Louise Fletcher
Playing at Hampshire Six Theatres

Since his departure from "Saturday Night Live," Jon Lovitz has proved that he can do almost anything successfully. His screechy whine, a signature that was able to carry his cartoon "The Critic" to syndication success, and his maniacal grin have made zany cameos on sitcoms "Friends" and "Seinfeld."

Unfortunately, with High School High, we discover that Lovitz seems to have a hard time playing the straight man for the length of a feature film, even one written and produced by David Zucker, that master of satire that brought us Airplane! and The Naked Gun.

In this send-up of films like The Blackboard Jungle and the more recent Dangerous Minds, Lovitz plays a teacher at the ultra-prestigious Wellington Academy where his father is the headmaster. One of the few jokes that maintains the level of humor we expect from Zucker comes here: the secretary answers the phone, "Wellington Academy, Hello? Are you white? Good, I'll put you through..."

Lovitz accepts a job at Marion Barry High School, the dumping ground for every troubled child in the school district. After an extended slap-stick sequence showing how decrepit the school is, the film adheres to the figure of those former films that set out to show us that even a kid with an attitude problem isn't a dummy, all these kids need is someone who will make the effort to reach them.

Zucker's satires have always walked the fine line between sophomoric stupidity and tasteless humor. With High School High, far too much time goes into sticking to the plot of turning these kids' academic careers around without enough jokes to keep us interested. To it's credit, when it remembers that it's a comedy, it's a pretty funny movie, but those moments are few and far between.

Tia Carrere is the lovely assistant to the principal who falls in love with Lovitz. The contrast between the shapely Carrere and the dumpy Lovitz is a one-punchline joke that is milked for all it's worth and quickly wears thin.

One of the films few consistent delights comes from Louise Fletcher as the tough-as-nails principal who we first see whacking kids around with a bat. Her scowl hasn't changed much from her days as Nurse Ratchet from One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest, but it's still entertaining, especially in what turns into a sea of sentimental goop. C-

No remote control needed on Web

Not enough cash to pick up the latest issue of the TV Guide? Don't fret because all the TV news, trivia and gossip couch potatoes could ever want is just a mouse click away.

All the major networks like NBC (www.nbc.com), ABC (www.abc.com), CBS (cbs-tv.tiac.net) and Fox (www.foxworld.com) have web sites containing all the propaganda TV lovers can enjoy when not in front of the big tube.

For those who want more than simple publicity, there are sites that provide trivia and memorabilia. However, no one should ever forget fans' online shrines dedicated to campy classics like Star Trek, CHiPs, Love Boat and of course contemporary favorites, too.

Remember the Super Friends from Saturday morning cartoons when you were a kid? For those who are a bit older, how about Linda Carter as Wonder Woman in the live action TV show? For all you TV fans who loved Wonder Woman, here is a site for you.

This site delves a little further than just Wonder Woman's stint on television. It includes information about the comic book version by DC comics and looks at various designs her costume went through. It also broadcasts the latest news on the possible Wonder Woman movie that Warner Brothers plans to produce.

There are a few multimedia and interactive twists on this site, too. Since a possible movie is in the works, the webmaster is asking users to determine who they think should play her — so far Star Trek: DS9's Terry Farrell seems to win every time. There is also a shockwave movie to view for users with high speed connections. This site will lasso users in, and hold them here for awhile, so it gets a B.

The Web Site of Love at www.usgcc.odu.edu/~ty/mst3k/MST3K.html

Fans of Mystery Science Theater 3000 will love this site because it's a thorough resource filled with everything fans need to know about one of Cable TV's most popular shows.

The site includes fare like episode schedules and ratings, plus news like the show's move from Comedy Central to the Sci Fi Channel.

Ever have difficulty understanding the plots of some of those cheesy movies shown on MST3K? If they've kept you awake at night, then the Web Site of Love has the answer in the form of movie summaries. The site also includes links to newsletters and the MST3K newsgroup. This site will shoot you into space B.

The Ultimate TV Show List at tvnet.com/UTVL/utvl.html

TVNet provides the Web surfing couch potato the "ultimate" guide to TV.

The site contains over 7000 links to 1333 pages dedicated to 1026 shows. The listings are arranged by comedy, drama, news and sports — even documentaries and public access. For couch potatoes too lazy to look up related TV newsgroups, there are links to them.

The list includes a searchable index. Users who know of a site not cataloged on the server can add their favorite show to the database. This site is more comprehensive than using a search engine to find pages about your favorite shows. Here is a great alternative to TV Guide, A-.

After spending a little time on the Net, couch potatoes may replace the big screen and trusty remote with the smaller screen of a computer monitor and mouse.

Winter sports gear up for cold season

Appalachian Mountain Club: a leader in education & preservation

As the weather becomes colder and the skies become grayer, don't retire your hiking boots to just walking from point A to B on the rugged troposphere of the University of Massachusetts. Check your boot's laces, salvage your camping gear from the back of your closet, maintain the air pressure in your bike tires, smooth the kinks out of your rock climbing rope, sharpen the blades of your ice skates and start looking for a pair of skis (if you don't already own one).

With predictions from the Farmer's Almanac for a mild November and above-normal winter snowfall, now is the time to become a member of the Appalachian Mountain Club, and enjoy Mother Nature's wonderful playground year round.

Based on the philosophy that successful long term conservation depends on first hand experience of the natural environment, the Appalachian Mountain Club (AMC) pursues an active conservation agenda, while encouraging responsible recreation throughout New England. The AMC's 64,000 members preserve the environment while following interests in hiking, canoeing, skiing, walking, rock climbing, bicycling, camping, kayaking and backpacking.

The AMC Education Department offers members and the general public a spectrum of work shops and introductory instruction in back country sports. These courses offer the public training in an array of wilderness techniques from introductory camping clinics to intensive seminars at the Mountain Leadership School taught on the trails of the White Mountains.

Professional and community volunteers in each AMC chapter lead educational and recreational outdoor activities and excursions throughout New England. Expert training in rock climbing, white water kayaking, glacier skiing and wilderness survival are just a few of the intense back country sports offered by each chapter.

Founded in 1876, AMC has been a leader of the environmental protection movement. By co-founding several of New England's leading environmental organizations, and working in coalition with these and many more groups, the AMC has influenced legislation and public opinion.

The Appalachian Mountain Club Research Department at Pinkham Notch Camp in New Hampshire focuses on all of the forces affecting the ecosystem, including ozone levels, acid rain and fog, climate change, rare flora and habitat protection. The most recent AMC Conservation Programs include river protection,

International guitar greats reunite

By Joshua Boyd
Collegian Staff

PACO DE LUCIA, AL DI MEOLA, JOHN MCLAUGHLIN
The Guitar Trio
Verve

It's been only three times in the last 15 years that the widely-acknowledged three greatest guitarists alive have appeared on full-length record. The Guitar Trio is the first album in 13 years from the trio featuring the American (Al Di Meola), the English (John McLaughlin) and the Spanish (Paco De Lucia) guitarists.

They are here in full splendor, playing music that all acoustic guitarists should hear. All three of the men are top grade and are the only musicians featured on the album. The playing and the production are mystical — the feel is needed and brightly exotic, sounding like dawn in Morocco.

McLaughlin, whose electric jazz/rock hybrid style of guitar on Miles Davis' 1969's Bitches Brew and 1970's A Tribute To Jack Johnson revolutionized jazz guitar, allowing others to turn it up and let it rock. He illustrates his international influences, switching between many Spanish, Indian and Far Eastern sounds, as well as common major and minor modes in many songs. As for McLaughlin's compositions, "Midsummer Night" is an upbeat piece that shows a bright side of the trio in its middle part, and the climactic "Le Monastere Dans Les Montagnes" also is taken in different musical phrases.

Di Meola's deep, dark flavor ironically played brightly, like it could be a 12-string guitar, is a musical suitcase that he has carried throughout his nearly three decades of playing. Di Meola, when he was just 19, was chosen by Davis' star keyboardist Chick Corea to be the guitarist in Corea's first post–Davis group project, Return To Forever.

His pieces, "Beyond The Mirage" and "Azzura" feature that deep, dark, yet bright Moroccan morning feel, his guitar solos echoing deep down in parts of the mind the listener probably wasn't aware of having ever used before.

"Espiritu" is a solo piece written and played by Di Meola only, illustrating studio magic where he gets to accompany his solos with mysterious rhythm guitar and percussion.

Known worldwide as the greatest flamenco guitar player, as well as one of the best all-around guitar stylists, De Lucia has spent a career writing and playing the music of his homeland, Spain. He employs the use of fingers over the sometimes artificial–sounding pick to release melodic, tasteful solos in the beautiful Spanish key. His compositions, the upbeat closer "Cardeosa" and the melodic carnival that is the opener, "La Estiba" in addition to his solos all over the disc, all present an appealing sense of witnessing twilight setting over the Rock of Gibraltar.

Acoustic guitarists, pay attention to this. Once you hear this disc you might not feel so up to just strumming rock chords and Pearl Jam songs next time. This is one disc the unplugged should surely look into, as well as anyone who appreciates international and virtuostic craft. A

Bugs the height of fashion

NEW YORK (AP) - While models strutted their stuff on the runways during the recent spring fashion shows here, one celebrity didn't need to worry about his wardrobe.

Several dozen of the world's most celebrated fashion designers had already created outfits just for this legendary screen star...the one...the only...the inimitable...Bugs Bunny.

More than 80 outfits were created for Bugs by designers such as Donna Karan, Gianni Versace, Todd Oldham, Dolce & Gabanna, Kate Spade, Sonia Rykeil, Missoni and Richard Tyler. The hare couture was among events marking the reopening of the Warner Bros. Studio Store.

Cynthia Rowley dressed Bugs in a gold suit with a black satin shirt. Mossimo paired a green-and-white checked suit with a yellow shirt and tie. And Burberry's fashioned for Bugs its trademark raincoat and hat, complete with matching plaid vest and bow tie. And for those campy occasions when Bugs wants to go drag (BugsPaul?), DKNY painted a denim skirt with a red-and-yellow plaid shirt and a sleeveless yellow vest. Diane von Furstenberg used a trendy animal print to update her classic wrap dress. And Isaac Mizrahi designed a full-length silver sleeveless dress with a jeweled accent. Work it, girlfriend.

"Bugs Bunny in all of his cartoons over the years has dressed up as women in trying to foil an Elmer Fudd or a Tazmanian Devil," said Karine Joret, a marketing spokeswoman at Warners Bros. "And a lot of designers took liberty with that and dressed him up as quite a sexy female."

Bugs models the outfits through the end of the year at the Warner Bros. Studio Store. Warner Bros. made a donation in each designer's name to the Pediatric AIDS Foundation. "Hare Couture" will then be placed on permanent display in the Warner Bros. Museum in Burbank, Calif.

Charles Brown still going at 74; Henderson alive on Big Band

Throughout Charles Brown's lifetime, he saw fellow Texas bluesmen like T-Bone Walker, Pee Wee Crayton and Stevie Ray Vaughan all come and go. From the 1940s to now, the 74-year-old smooth-voiced "cool blues" crooner has made a name for himself by maintaining his talent of writing piano– based, jazz–softened late-night blues.

His new album, Honey Dripper, is a delightful addition to his previous Gitanes/Verve Records release, These Blues. It is quite easy to imagine that Brown is singing about himself on the title track. His voice is as slowly fluid as it was on his 1940s singles, "Driftin' Blues" and "Black Nite." His piano playing retains the same high–pitched rolls and hooks as before.

Danny Caron, Brown's guitarist, shows that blues guitar doesn't have to be flashy like Vaughan's style, yet can still stir up the lowest feelings in one's heart, especially in the open-er "News All Over Town." Etta Jones duets with Brown on "If I Had You," and Irene Reid sings on "They All Say I'm The Biggest Fool," both women evoking the ghost of Dinah Washington. The best song is Brown's take on the dramatically beautiful Ray Noble ballad, "The Very Thought Of You."

On the opposite end of the blues timeline is Deanna Bogart. Still based mostly in Maryland and Eastern Virginia, Bogart has been heading her own band since 1988 and her third album, New Address (Vicerоots), shows that this is an artist ready for the spotlight.

Even though sometimes her music has the kind of blues that has already brought the spotlight on Bonnie Raitt, Bogart proves on New Address over and over that she is still a blues singer–songwriter to be reckoned with. "Checks And Love Letters" and "Slipped, Tripped, Fell In Love" both greatly feature this Raitt over–influence, but the songs "Missing Persons Bureau," written by Bobby Womack, and "Said It Wouldn't Rain" are done so wonderfully soulful. The latter is a terrific piano–based song with strings attached that is almost reminiscent of Leonard Cohen's early work, minus Cohen's ability for painfully uplifting lyrics.

Speaking of piano, that's what you'll find as the main or solo instrument on every tune of Capitol's re–issue of The Peaceful Side of Billy Strayhorn. Duke Ellington's prime partner in piano, big band composing and arranging is mostly by himself on this January 1961 one–session recording. Here are skeletal versions of his greatest songs, "Lush Life," and "Take The 'A' Train," the latter, one of the Duke Ellington Orchestra's most frequently–performed and most–loved tunes, features a string quartet accompanying Strayhorn's placid piano. He duets with French bassist Michel Goudret (the sessions for this album were conducted in Paris) on "Just A–Sittin' And A–Rockin'," a tune Strayhorn wrote with Ellington and "Something To Live For," with, in the quiet context of this album, a climactic middle part. As Miles Davis once wrote, "Shh, Peaceful."

Joe Henderson, veteran tenor saxophonist, has been waiting for decades to make a big band album. His dream comes alive with the simply titled Big Band (Verve). Featuring himself as main soloist and composer–arranger, Henderson also includes in his band the great pianist Chick Corea and onc of the best bassists today, Christian McBride, as well as an all–star trumpet line featuring Freddie Hubbard, Jon Faddis, Nicolas Payton and Lew Soloff. Former Miles Davis drummer Al Foster switches the drum seat with Joe Chambers, and many others on various instruments join in.

A lot of these songs coast easily, yet with complex big– band arranging. "Inner Urge" starts off dramatically, and then after climactic band shouts, the soloists stroll on easily. "Step Lightly" features a big–band version of late–night blues that Brown is capable of, with a ghostly trumpet solo by Payton and summary comments by Corea at the end. The whole band shines especially on the last two tracks – Strayhorn's "Chelsea Bridge" (on The Peaceful Side... also), and the Latin–flavored "Recordame."

they were overrated this week when they rolled over and died against Syracuse. C'est la vie, Mountaineers.

Don't feel bad, Northwestern. You weren't supposed to even be in the bowl picture, but for the second year in a row you squeezed out wins against teams with superior talent, more tradition and more fans. Coach Gary Barnett has done all he can with what he's given, which isn't much considering Northwestern actually has academic standards for its student–athletes. Props to Barnett and the Wildcats.

Booty Schwag of the Week Award...

While it may seem obvious who deserves the vaunted schwag this week, I think BC belongs in a different category of schwag, a category we as a civilization can't even fathom yet. Could it be the Boot–hey Schwizz–ag? The Booooty– Schwiggity–diggity–dizzag? They might even have crossed into Boo–t–Schwank territory. It's not often that a degree of schwag appears in such obvious form. Sometimes I have to think about the schwag, debate the schwag in my head.

But the thing is, BC was getting the schwag before the gambling allegations came to light. For the love of God, they lost to Pitt! But with this week's revelations, I think we can safely say BC is a first ballot Booty Schwag Hall of Fame selection. They could even house a Hall of Fame in Chestnut Hill, and open it with a special ceremony, inviting such past schwag selections as Temple, Arizona St. and Villanova. Question is, would Dan Henning give the keynote address?

Tonight's Game...

Finally, a good game! San Diego St. hosts Wyoming in a crucial game as far as the Holiday Bowl is concerned. Wyoming is a 2 point dog despite being 9–0. Cowboy quarterback Josh Wallwork is one of the most underrated players in the country, and you know how many points WAC games tally up. Like BC coach Dan Henning says, "Take the over, take the over!"

53 on a 15 foot jumper by sophomore Charlton Clarke with 12 minutes to play. UMass took the lead again on a jumper by rookie forward Winston Smith (67–65), but that would be the last time.

The Minutemen came within a point (69–70), but Marathon Basketball rolled on for the win.

"I was satisfied with the effort of the team," Flint said. "When you have a lot of young guys, you don't know how hard they are going to play at this intensity level. That was the one thing we geared this game for."

Missing from the UMass lineup was freshman center Ajmal Basit who sat out with back spasms.

"He probably could have played, but we just didn't want to chance it," Flint said.

"People at UMass don't like to lose, even in exhibition," Marathon coach Glenn Sergent said. "But when the blood settles down, they'll look back and say it was a good game."

While it didn't get a win UMass got a chance to see what newcomers Kirkland, Keiner, Smith and Mike Babul had to offer and how they meshed with the returning stars.

The Minutemen are back in action next week when they will face the Converse All–Stars next Friday at 7 p.m.

■ sluggish start

"We're six to seven weeks ahead of everyone we play," Cline said. "We come in and have an edge on everyone else."

Cline went on to add, "I think knowing Joanie [O'Brien] as a hard nosed coach and player, we knew UMass would come in ready to play. They had good speed and quickness, and they're finding their way."

According to Cline, UMass was the least physical of the six teams A.I.A. has played so far this season, an observation not lost on O'Brien.

"We're not going to be a physical team, though we've never been a soft team," O'Brien said. "We have to rely more on speed and quickness."

Athletes In Action owned the perimeter throughout the Minutewomen's first outing, going 14–27 from behind the three point arc, led by a six–for–10 performance by Blades.

Asked about her three–point barrage, Blades expressed surprise about the Minutewomen's strategy.

"I thought they would make an adjustment," Blades said. "But they didn't, so I just kept bombing."

The Minutewomen return to action on Nov. 12 when the Russian Select team invades the Mullins Center. UMass kicks off the 1996–1997 season on Nov. 24, when they entertain perennial Big–10 power Ohio State.

UCLA fires head coach Jim Harrick

By Beth Harris
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Jim Harrick, second only to the Wizard himself in UCLA basketball victories, was fired yesterday for an alleged recruiting violation and lying about an expense account.

The coach admitted he falsified and then lied about the expense report, but later corrected it. He also said the punishment "outweighed the crime by mountains and miles."

The dismissal came just two weeks before the start of the 1996-97 season, and 19 months after he coached the Bruins to their first NCAA basketball title in 20 years — the first since John Wooden presided as the Wizard of Westwood.

It also came a mere week before the start of the fall signing period.

Steve Lavin, a 32-year-old assistant, will be the interim coach this year; the school will look for a successor during the season. Chancellor Charles Young said Harrick was offered the option of resigning but "he did not take that option."

"He was terminated," and will not be paid, he said.

"I felt I had no alternative," Young said during a campus news conference. "We think what we did was right. It is a very serious infraction."

Later, at his lawyer's office, Harrick said: "They're making something out of it that it's not."

Asked if he lied to athletic director Peter Dalis about the expense account for a dinner attended by three recruits and five players, Harrick said, "I did, but I corrected it."

Young said Harrick never disputed the facts as presented during a meeting Tuesday night when the 58-year-old coach was fired. "[The situation] would've been treated differently if he had been forthright from the beginning," Dalis said.

Harrick said he decided not to resign because "if you resign, then I'm saying they have something, and I agree with them." He said he was fired without warning, "with no explanation whatsoever."

"It's like getting hit in the head with a 2-by-4. I thought maybe they would reprimand me," he said.

The team's three seniors — Charles O'Bannon, Cameron Dollar and Bob Myers — attended the campus news conference that was packed with stunned students.

"We wouldn't be here right now if he'd told the truth from the beginning," O'Bannon said, while acknowledging that Harrick has always been a role model for him.

"The penalty is very severe and we don't think it was deserving of what happened," O'Bannon said. "This violation, I'm sure, he didn't realize was so severe."

Baseball owners reject labor deal again

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

ROSEMONT, Ill. — Baseball owners voted 18-12 yesterday to reject their proposed five-year labor agreement with the players' association, instead asking the union to modify the deal.

At the end of a deeply divided six-hour meeting that included a National League rebuke to the authority of acting commissioner Bud Selig, owners voted 30-0 to give their ruling executive council the authority to ratify a modified agreement on behalf of all major league teams.

"While we could not accept the proposed agreement as presented, there is substantial agreement on the vast majority of issues," Selig said, trying to put his best spin on things.

Union head Donald Fehr, reached yesterday at his hotel in London, took a wait-and-see approach, but any changes are sure to be rejected by the players, who have said they would not consider additional alterations.

"I'm not going to have anything to say until I learn more," Fehr said in a telephone interview.

The moves by owners may be just part of the cat-and-mouse of negotiations, but it also may signal that the sport will operate for yet another season under the agreement that expired in December 1993. The deal remains in force under the federal court order than ended the 232-day strike on March 31, 1995.

"The real deadline is Nov. 15," Levine said. "After midnight Nov. 14, it's not going to be done."

Players who have filed for free agency may not start signing with new teams until Nov. 15. Once that date is reached with no deal, the sides are locked into another offseason under the rules of the old agreement.

A three-quarters majority — 23 of 30 votes — was needed to approve the agreement and the motion fell 11 votes short.

Selig's daughter — Wendy Selig-Prieb — told other owners that she cast the Milwaukee Brewers' vote against the deal, according to a management official who spoke on the condition he not be identified. Her move was a direct repudiation of management negotiator Randy Levine, who was hired by her father In September 1995 to achieve the elusive agreement.

Levine, who concluded the agreement with Fehr on Oct. 24 before Game 5 of the World Series, had threatened to resign if the deal was voted down. After he gave a presentation that lasted about three hours, Levine was told to leave the room and excluded from the debate.

"I'm extremely disappointed about the vote," said Levine, who may quit next week. "What Don and I came to when we finished negotiations is the best that I could do."

The management source said two secret votes were conducted as Selig attempted to rally support against the agreement in a show of strength. St. Louis switched sides, according to the official, and Baltimore also voted against the deal.

THEFT OF MEDICAL EXAM FOILED IN S.F.
17-year-old With Nonfunctioning Gun Beaten by Students
By H. K. Lee and C. Bowman, Chronicle Staff Writers

A young masked gunman burst into a room full of students taking a medical exam Saturday in San Francisco and demanded a copy of a test section but was thwarted when several outraged proctors and would-be doctors punched him out, police said yesterday.

Police said the youth grabbed a green folder at the front of the room, disappeared into a bathroom and then re-merged, cursing. He then confronted a proctor, demanding the Physical Sciences portion of the test. As the proctor fumbled for the test section, the youth may have been careless with his gun—the proctor grabbed it, and suddenly the intruder found himself at gunpoint.

The youth then apparently smacked the proctor in the face. Enraged, at least five proctors and test-takers surrounded the suspect and threw punches at him, drawing blood, witnesses said...

HOROSCOPES

ARIES
March 21-April 20

Focus on building up your savings. There could be a rainy day coming up, and being prepared early is your best course of action. Don't fall under a shallow person's charms. There could be an ulterior motive at work—and a shady one, at that.

TAURUS
April 21-May 21

You don't have to tell everything you know, even if someone asks. And this week in particular, silence would be the best course of action. Fear is a great motivator, but it also paralyzes. Think your options through and then take action.

GEMINI
May 22-June 21

Gear up for a busy week. Get down to business and you'll beat a tight deadline. Don't be shy in asking for all the relevant information, either. Next time, plan ahead a little further, and your performance will be even more impressive.

CANCER
June 22-July 22

Ask for financial advice before you start a new savings program. Avoid the temptation to go on a spending spree—leave the plastic at home. An older friend has some wisdom to share about a problem that's been troubling you.

LEO
July 23-August 23

You're at your best during an unplanned meeting. A romantic reason sparks your interest in a new way. You might want to make a commitment—it's a good time for that. A mutual admiration society gives you a chance to do more than talk.

VIRGO
August 24-September 22

You're footloose and fancy-free this week—mundane tasks hold no interest for you. If deadlines loom, give yourself a strict time frame for being irresponsible and carefree—then force yourself to stick to it. It's hard, but you may be inspired.

LIBRA
September 23-October 23

It's impossible to keep all your options open this week, so resign yourself to the fact that you must make a decision, and then do it. Once it's made, don't look back. Second-guessing yourself would risk all the progress you've made to date.

SCORPIO
October 24-November 22

A pleasant tone in your voice will sugarcoat even the bitterest pill. Be very clear, both to yourself and to others, about what you expect, and you'll be happy with the outcome. Extend a deadline if you need more time—focus on quality, not quantity.

SAGITTARIUS
November 23-December 21

A burdensome situation won't ease until you take decisive action. Plan a reward for yourself for after you do something particularly difficult—treat yourself and a friend to a movie, or just take time to talk with someone you miss very much.

CAPRICORN
December 22-January 20

Although right now it feels like you have got it all, it's important that you don't neglect the feelings of someone close to you. Especially if you are busy at work, you could be ignoring some fairly serious cries for attention. Someone close to you gives you good advice that is pertinent to your job.

AQUARIUS
January 21-February 18

Don't give up your goals in response to a small setback. Instead, focus on the objectives that lead to your goals. You may be due for a difficult lesson—the more open you are to suggestions, the better off you'll be.

PISCES
February 19-March 20

Stick to family when it comes to discussing personal matters. Although it's tempting to bare your soul elsewhere, this week it would be a bad idea. Stay out of the limelight—someone could grow even more envious than they already are.

Men's and women's hoop fall in exhibition double

Flint, Minutemen shake out cobwebs with loss

By Chris Stamm
Collegian Staff

Even though Massachusetts men's basketball coach James "Bruiser" Flint did not come away with a win in his first game as head coach of the Minutemen last night, one thing was clear. You can change the faces in the UMass lineup, but not its style of play.

While Bruiser and his boys fell to Marathon Basketball 77-73 last night in the William D. Mullins Center, it was clear from the start that this young team plays with all the enthusiasm and desire that has become a trademark of UMass hoops.

UMASS	73
MARATHON	77

The Minutemen came out of the blocks in the first half at full throttle, though an older and more experienced Marathon squad kept it close. After beating preseason favorite Villanova Tuesday night in Philadelphia 84-79, it was clear Marathon came to play.

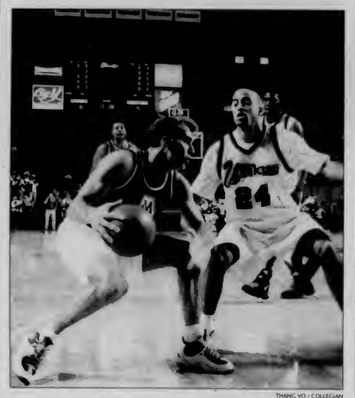
Veteran guard Edgar Padilla got the ball rolling when he nailed a jumper inside the arc to give UMass a 2-0 lead. Marathon tied it up early at 6-6 on a free throw by 6-foot-4 forward Dylan Ridgdon

Three minutes into the game, sophomore center Lari Ketner made his presence known. After sinking a layup on a dish from Carmelo Travieso (16 points, 6 rebounds, and 5 assists) the 6-foot-10 Ketner raced the other way on defense erasing a Marathon shot in the paint that set the Mullins faithful into a frenzy.

The two squads exchanged points, knotting the score at 25 a piece with 10:57 to go on a layup by Marathon's Jim DeGraffenreid. That's when things got messy for the Minutemen.

Marathon stepped it up with a 13-0 run which left UMass behind 36-23 with 6:08 in the first frame. However, this is when the true Minuteman spirit emerged.

On the inspired defense of the cagey senior guard, Travieso, UMass regained composure with an 11-3 run of its own trimming Marathon's halftime lead to three with a score of 34-39 at the end of the half.



Minutes into the second set, rookie forward Chris Kirkland electrified the crowd with slashing defense, forcing two Marathon turnovers in the early minutes of the half. UMass did well defensively last night, with Kirkland and Travieso leading the way as UMass forced 19 turnovers on the night.

Down by three, 44-41, senior big man Tyrone Weeks, who put up a double-double on the night (19 points, 11 boards) finished off a Kirkland miss in the paint to cut Marathon's lead to a point.

After forcing Marathon into a five second violation on the inbounds pass, Travieso nailed a jumper a step inside the arc off the flex for the lead.

It was tight the rest of the way, after the score was knotted again at

Minutewomen start the season off sluggish

By Luke Meredith
Collegian Staff

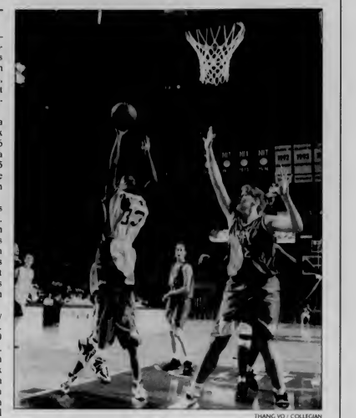
The Massachusetts women's basketball team got off to an auspicious debut last night, as Athletes In Action, helped by 14 three-pointers, broke off a 22-5 run late in the first half and cruised from there, defeating the Minutewomen 83-55.

Vanderbilt product Rolanda Blades had 21 points, including six treys, and Suzanne Ressa added 16 of her own as A.I.A. pushed a 43-29 halftime lead to a 60-35 advantage with 13:35 to go in the ballgame, putting the Minutewomen away for good.

"They were pretty good," UMass head coach Joanie O'Brien said. "The team that wins is the team that learns the most from this game. We're gonna learn a lot from tonight's game."

UMASS	55
A.I.A.	83

UMass jumped out to an early 7-0 lead, but a 12-2 run by A.I.A. put the Minutewomen behind 12-9 with 16:09 left in the first half. UMass and Athletes In Action swapped the lead for the next six minutes, and the Minutewomen took an 18-16 lead on a Sabriya Mitchell layup with 10:44 to go in the half. But Blades hit the second of her six three-pointers on A.I.A.'s next possession, giving them a lead they would would never relinquish. A.I.A. hit three 3-pointers in a span of 2:19 minutes to take a five point lead, and pushed that lead to 15 before the Minutewomen called a timeout with 2:43 to go in the half. Athletes In Action took a 14 point lead into the locker room.



An Alison Macfarland layup 1:04 seconds into the second half would cut the Athletes In Action lead back to 14, at 45- 31, but that's as close as the Minutewomen would get in the second half.

UMass was paced by senior forward Crystal Carrol's 11 points and 10 rebounds, and senior guard Mitchell's nine points. The Minutewomen received some help from their youngsters, with freshman Mcfarland adding 10 points and three rebounds, and fellow frosh guard Kelly Van Huisen contributing six points and three assists in 24 minutes of action.

"I think the two who learn the most from this game are Alison [Macfarland] and Kelly [Van Huisen,]" O'Brien said. "I wasn't worried about the offense, that's something that'll come with time."

Athletes In Action are led by 1976 Olympic silver medalist Nancy Liberman-Cline, who is considered by many one of the greatest female basketball players of all time, and was inducted into the Basketball Hall of Fame in May. Cline had eight points in 19 minutes of playing time. Cline and A.I.A. have been playing together for a couple months now, and, according to Cline, having a few games under their belt was a key factor in the win.

BC too low to rebound against Irish

You'd think I would have started this week's installment of "Luke Meredith on College Football" with the latest on the BC mess. But if you read yesterday's Collegian, you know how I feel on that issue.

Like Forrest Gump once said, "That's all I have to say about that."

This week, we have a slate of games in which almost nothing of importance will occur. The Top 10 is littered with opponents who will be nothing more than a scrimmage. Nebraska is a 47 point favorite against Missouri, Ohio State is a 29 point favorite at home against Illinois, Florida State is a 47 point favorite versus Wake Forest, and Florida is a 43 point favorite at Vanderbilt.

You don't need a BC tailback to tell you who will win those games.

But there's an interesting development for the nation's No. 4 squad, Arizona St. California comes to Tempe, and although the Sun Devils are a 15 point favorite, I sense trouble for ASU. This is a big game as far as the Pac-10 standings go, and Arizona State really hasn't played a big game this year, except for Nebraska. But keep in mind that they beat a Nebraska team that was inexperienced and young. Nebraska has hit its stride now, just ask Oklahoma. If the Cornhuskers ever got ASU in a rematch, oh boy. You also remember that the Sun Devils needed overtime to dispose of USC.

Now you all know I try to stay away from predictions, but since this seems to be "Illegal Gambling Week" in Massachusetts, I'll give you my pick.

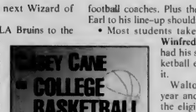
Come Saturday night, the Sun Devil Cinderella ride is over, courtesy of a few Bears from Berkeley. Just a word of advice to any celebrating Cal fans Saturday night. Don't eat the brown acid, the brown acid is bad!

Don't it make you sad?

In another Eagle scandal, my beloved North Texas Eagles lost to Utah State this weekend, and upon arriving back in Denton the coaching staff discovered that $1,400 worth of property from the hotel that the Eagles stayed at was tucked away neatly in some of the players bags. The items included towels, pillows, blankets and even a VCR.

I feel the need to side with my North Texas boys and come clean. I stole a towel from the hotel when we covered the Villanova game in early September, and I've felt horrible ever since. But a VCR? Didn't they think that someone would go in the room and realize that the VCR was gone? You know, you pick up a team that nobody cares about, you give them publicity, and then they steal video equipment from the hotel. Not cool, North Texas, not cool. I may even have to find a new overmatched D-1 team to love. Florida A&M, anyone?

The BC "Inside Tip" pick of the week...



A new installment, but I feel something already with this one. For the first pick, I'm going with Notre Dame, a 21 point favorite at BC. I'm not trying to pick on the Eagles, but there is no way that BC recovers in time to put up a fight against the Irish, who know that the Eagles have surprised them in the past. So call up your favorite BC football player\bookie and drop a few bills on the Irish, because ND will romp.

Who's got their claws in you, my friend?

This week we say goodbye to two teams who rode the "underrated" train a week too long. Northwestern and West Virginia. Northwestern was on the verge of another late season run at the roses, but Penn St. ended that pipe dream quickly, crushing the Wildcats. West Virginia, who lost an undefeated run courtesy of a Miami blocked punt two weeks ago, made sure America knew

Lavin may follow in Harrick's footsteps; 1090 score may cost Walton his eligibility

I guess Jim Harrick isn't quite the next Wizard of Westwood.

Only 19 months after he led his UCLA Bruins to the men's basketball national title, Harrick was let go by the University yesterday. UCLA chancellor Charles Young announced the firing in a news release, and scheduled a press conference for later in the afternoon.

Steve Lavin, a 32-year-old assistant coach under Harrick, has been given the interim position while the school looks for a new head coach.

Harrick, who had signed a five-year deal with an annual salary of over $400,000 in the summer of 1995, compiled a 191-63 career mark in his time as the Bruins' coach.

The team went 23-8 last year, losing to Princeton in the first round of the NCAAs. Lavin, who is in his sixth season with the team and his second as a full-time assistant, will get all five starters back, and the team is expected to rank in the top five nationally when preseason polls are released next week.

UCLA starts its season Nov. 20 against Tulsa in the preseason NIT.

• Speaking of coaches in the hot seat, Louisiana State's Dale Brown may be walking on dangerously thin ice.

With two years remaining on his contract, Brown isn't worried about his job, saying that he plans to remain at LSU for awhile.

LSU Athletic Director Joe Dean, however, said that he's fired coaches before and "I'll do it (fire Brown)."

In his 24 years as the Tigers' coach, Brown has compiled a 438-281 record, 13 NCAA Tournaments, two Final Fours and four Elite Eights. That record, though, includes three- straight losing seasons.

But Brown is optimistic. He has outlasted six LSU chancellors, six governors, six athletic directors and seven football coaches. Plus the addition of top-recruit Lester Earl to his line-up shouldn't hurt.

• Most students take the SAT to get into college. Winfred Walton took the exam and has had his scholarship revoked and his basketball eligibility suspended because of it.

Walton originally took the test last year and got an 810. 10 points shy of the eligibility cut-off line. He took the test again in May and made a 280-point improvement. 280 points!

Syracuse University, where Walton was set to wear No. 44, the same number given to former Orangemen Derrick Coleman and John Wallace, withdrew his scholarship and is not allowing Walton to play until an investigation into the score is finished.

• Big, bad Danya Abrams... Yadda, yadda, yadda.

Abrams showed he can get knocked down too, literally. In Tuesday night's exhibition game, which pitted Abrams' Boston College squad against the Converse All-Stars, Abrams took a roundhouse punch from Converse's Jonathan Roberts in the waning minutes of the game.

The punch leveled Abrams, who was on the floor for several minutes. He was taken to a hospital and given a few stitches above his left eye, before being sent on his way.

Unfortunately, BC won the game 90-85.

• Speaking of the Converse All-Stars, former UMass point guard and current radio broadcaster Derek Kellogg led Converse with 18 points last week, but his team fell to future Minuteman opponent UNC-Wilmington 93-92 last week.

• Hey hoop fans, Sunday, March 9, 1997, better known as Selection Sunday, the unofficial start to March Madness, is only four months and two days away.

Watters, Myers help bloody the Crimson

By Jeremy R. Adams
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts volleyball team is officially on a roll. The Minutewomen won their third straight match, their fifth in six attempts, on Tuesday over Harvard in Cambridge.

HARVARD	0

The win improves their overall record to 21-7, dropping the Minutewomen's Ivy League foe to a mediocre 10-15. The previous two victories of their miniature winning streak came over Atlantic 10 conference opponents St. Bonaventure and Duquesne this past weekend.

The match was not much of a contest, as Massachusetts took control early, winning the first game 15-9. There was no let up by the Minutewomen, they cruised through Boston's neighboring college town with a three game win, taking the last two 15-2 and 15-5.

The win marked the fourteenth time this season that Massachusetts needed just three games to win. the fourth time it has done so on the road. It also puts the Minutewomen's away record over .500 for the first time this season, at 6-5.

Freshmen Sarah Watters and Jill Meyers were the driving force behind the Massachusetts attack, combining for 27 kills in the short victory. Meyers has been one of the Minutewomen's go-to players for much of the season, while Watters has stepped up her performance recently due to injuries. The two have been playing the roles of upperclassmen, contributing much of the offensive production.

Senior Dionne Nash chipped in 10 kills for the Minutewomen, playing off of the usual consistent performance of sophomore setter Katie Pearce. Pearce averages 12.88 assists per game, and leads the team with 32 service aces, tied with Michelle Paciorek.

The Minutewoman play at home this weekend against Fordham on Friday, and against La Salle on Saturday. Both matches will be at the Curry Hicks Cage. Friday's match is at 7 p.m., and Saturday's is a 2 p.m. matinee.

The following four matches will all be at home for Massachusetts, including A-10 action against Temple next Saturday.

UMass intramural Final Fours underway

It's Tournament time, baby. The intramural fall season is coming to an end, and the athletes that do it just for the love of the game are preparing to be UMass's best of the rest. It is tournament time, and the fall sports have their Final Four matchups all ready to go.

So, without further ado, here are your UMass intramural sports finalists.

Men's soccer--
Amherst United vs. Delta Chi A
Sigma Alpha Mu vs. Delirium

Women's soccer:
The Vixen Women vs. The Hootchies
The Bushwackers vs. Rowdies

Co-Ed Softball:
Brewsers vs. Endangered Species
Porkadelics vs. Sons of Pitches

One of the largest brackets in recent intramural history for men's flag football is beginning to wind down, and at press time the field has narrowed down to eight teams.

All games will be played on the Lower Boyden Fields, with soccer and softball finals starting this week. Game times are at 4:30 p.m., and be there early or you will lose the good seats.

Sports Briefs

Sleigh bells ring, are you listening... The intramural sports office at 215 Boyden Gym are still accepting women's basketball team rosters for the Holiday Basketball Tournament.

Before you know it, the holidays will be come and gone, and spring intramural sports will be around the corner. Any teams that are interested in the Spring Ice Hockey and Basketball leagues must enter their team rosters this semester. Inquiries and rosters can be made to the office at 215 Boyden at 545-0022.

Any entries for Sports Briefs must be handed in by Wednesday at 12 p.m. for Thursday publication. While the fall season is winding down, all winter teams are encouraged to submit material. Today's column was compiled by Collegian columnist Jorma Kansanen.

CNN succeeds in bid for bureau in Havana

ATLANTA (AP) — The Cable News Network won permission from the Cuban government yesterday to open a bureau in Havana, if approved by U.S. officials, CNN would be the first American-based news organization with a full-time presence in the Communist country.

The Cuban Foreign Ministry announced the decision in a brief statement in Havana.

"We've been working on it for a while," CNN spokesman David Talley said. The next step is to win approval from the State Department, and "we have no idea how long that will be."

No details of the Havana bureau have been set, pending U.S. permission, Talley said.

In recent years, U.S. journalists have been allowed to make reporting trips to Cuba, and Cuban officials say that more than 90 percent of visas requested from American reporters have been approved. But the U.S. trade embargo had prevented news organizations from opening bureaus on the island.

The door to a permanent U.S. news media presence was opened a year ago when President Clinton issued an executive order easing restrictions on travel to Cuba by Cuban-Americans, academics, clergy and students.

Ca.'s Prop 215 at odds with nat'l drug policies

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) — As celebratory marijuana smoke curled from pipes and joints at the headquarters of Proposition 215, uncertainty swirled around the future of California's newly approved medical marijuana law.

Although the law allows doctors to prescribe marijuana for medical reasons, there is no mechanism for patients to legally obtain it. And the measure is at odds with U.S. drug laws.

"We still have a federal law that says marijuana has no medical value, and that it is against the law to grow it, distribute it and prescribe it as medicine," said retired Army Gen. Barry McCaffrey, President Clinton's drug czar. "That's a law. Not my law. That's the U.S. Congress' law."

McCaffrey said Wednesday he planned to meet with Attorney General Janet Reno and other officials to discuss how the initiative, approved by California voters 56 percent to 44 percent Tuesday, affects federal drug enforcement efforts.

The measure legalizes the cultivation, possession and use of marijuana for health reasons. Users hailed the initiative as a compassionate way of helping ease the pain and suffering of people with AIDS, cancer and other terminal illnesses.

The controversy didn't bother Dennis Peron, one of the leaders behind the measure, who was still savoring the victory Wednesday.

GSS president alleges racist Faculty Senate

By Jonathan Liberty
Collegian Staff

"What happened to me at the Faculty Senate meeting today was absolutely racist," said University of Massachusetts Graduate Student Senate (GSS) President Deepika Marya.

Marya was addressing an occurrence which took place during the question period for Selma Botman, Vice President for Academic Affairs, in which she was asked to stop speaking. Later, a white male senator was not given the same treatment.

Marya asked a question of Botman, to which Botman responded, then proceeded to ask two follow-up questions.

Then Presiding Officer of the Faculty Senate Frank Hugus stopped and informed her that senate was in a question period — not a discussion. He added that discussion should take place in a different forum.

As the question period continued, Sen. Robert Costrell and Botman were involved in a discussion as equally lengthy as Marya's.

Because Hugus was not stopping Costrell, Marya interrupted the discussion.

"Was I stopped because I am a person of color?" Marya asked. "This is a very unfair senate."

Hugus said that the idea that the Faculty Senate is racist is "fanciful."

"Marya cui Costrell off or else I would have," he said. "I am an equal opportunity cutter-offer. As presiding officer, I simply try to observe the by-laws of the Faculty Senate."

However, Marya pointed out that after she interrupted Costrell, Hugus encouraged him to continue.

Also during the meeting, Hugus would not move away from the podium/microphone in order to let Marya speak; when a senator asked Marya to speak into the microphone, Hugus did not move. Instead tilting the microphone towards her.

Yet Hugus routinely moves away from the podium for Secretary of the Faculty Senate John Bracey.

"It is a very, very clear issue of race and gender," Marya said.

Marya did address the senate about the status of diversity and multiculturalism at the University.

"I have a deep concern regarding the rhetoric we have been hearing on this campus for a long time on diversity and multiculturalism," she said.

Marya cited several incidents of racism at the University, including insensitivity from Barbara Burn and the International Programs Office, the false accusation of a student of color stealing from the University Store and the employment of an all-white security staff at the University Store.

Marya demanded a response from the Faculty Senate.

"We wish she [Marya] would come and talk to the Rules Committee," Hugus said. "We would be more than happy to talk."

Amidst the alleged racial tension, the meeting continued.

Botman said that she wants to link academic and students affairs.

She also reported that President William P. Bulger has been visiting Massachusetts high schools in order to recruit students.

"Every time the president goes to visit a high school, he hits a home run," she said.

Bulger has been meeting with students to inform them about the value of higher education and the value of the University.

When asked about the ethnic diversity of the schools Bulger has been visiting, Botman said, "That is not an issue that needs to be worried about at all."

She added that the president is now responding to invitations from high schools across the Commonwealth and that she is pleased that the schools are very representative of the population.

A senator expressed concern about the department of Asian Languages and Literature.

She cited that by Dec. 1997, there will only be four tenure track faculty members in the department.

Security issues at store discussed

COURTNEY SMITH/COLLEGIAN

A meeting was held yesterday evening to discuss the recent University Store controversy.

By Daniel E. Levenson
Collegian Staff

Students met with the Director of Business and Facilities Services Elizabeth Dale at the Campus Center Student Union Commision meeting Thursday to discuss security policies at the University Store, which have come under fire in recent weeks for their allegedly racist practices.

Students were concerned over the Oct. 5 incident that sparked a student protest on Oct. 15, which involved an African American student, Pierre Elysee.

Elysee was falsely accused of shoplifting at the University Store by an all-white security staff.

"The folks at the store want to create an atmosphere that's welcoming," Dale said.

She said that students of color who currently work at the store will meet with Pat Crutchfield of staff training and development to discuss their concerns.

There are also plans to conduct diversity training for full- time Campus Center/Student Union employees.

Dale said that a search committee, which will include students, will be established to find a individual to fill a managerial position at the University Store.

When hired, the manager will work on revamping University Store employment and security policies.

"We're going to try and identify an individual who is already employed on this campus," Dale said.

If an acceptable candidate cannot be found on campus, the search will move to off-campus.

Dale hopes to have the position filled by the end of this semester.

One student criticized Dale by saying that the process to hire someone was moving too fast, and that it would be hard to find a qualified person anytime soon.

Others attending the meeting responded to that concern, saying that an off-campus search would take the same amount of time and thus should be initiated.

Dale said new security measures are being considered for the store, including the implementation of electronic deterrents to theft, such as security cameras.

"I would rather deter people from shoplifting rather than apprehend them," Dale said.

Four security firms will be invited to meet with a committee to discuss available options. Students will also serve on this comittee.

"We need to have some form of security at the store," said Dale. "Whatever we do we will do with a tremendous amount of student input."

Students who attended the meeting also discussed their concerns about employment opportunities for people of color within the Campus Center/Student Union complex.

Dale has been working to find a solution since the original incident. The ensuing protest outside the University Store, which included a open-mike for students to express their concerns, challenged Dale on several fronts.

The University Store has already responded to the incident by eliminating the all-white student security staff. The students were relocated to different positions in the store.

CCBMCC to hold first conference

By Gregory Casimir
Collegian Staff

The first annual Men of Color Conference will take place at the Campus Center today. The three-day event was created to help address the many problems that men of color at the University of Massachusetts have had in staying in school and in graduating.

The conference is being orchestrated by the Collegiate Coalition of Black Males for Community Consciousness (CCBMCC). The CCBMCC is a non-RSO whose purpose is to bridge the gaps between established RSOs and non-RSOs with the advantage of flexibility that no singular organization has.

Some of the organizations that comprise the CCBMCC are Phi Beta Sigma Frat., Inc, the Malcolm X Cultural Center, 307, CCEBMS, the Black Student Union and Boricuas Unidos.

The first day of the conference is an orientation and dinner that includes a speech by Rick Townes, the Vice Chancellor of Student Activities. The weekend conference includes workshops that focus on four central areas that immediately affect men of color in their experience in college: social identification; academic success; surviving the university; and the future outlook.

These topics will be presented through open forums, lectures, discussions and breakup groups, and will be facilitated by faculty, graduate and undergraduate leaders.

The direction of each workshop will be shaped by the interaction between conference moderators, and active participation on the part of all the students enrolled.

Another benefit of this conference is that it will count as a credit for those who are enrolled. Thus, the conference is immediately impacting the academic status of men of color while it tries to prepare them to do it on their own.

"This conference will allow students to deal with issue critical to their academic advancement and enable them to change the culture of UMass," said James Callahan, the executive director of the CCBMCC.

Clinton list includes budget, tax plans; student and family concerns also noted

By Calvin Woodward
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Now the IOUs from president to citizen start coming due.

Tax breaks for children, college-bound students and home sellers top the list of President Clinton's cash-in-your-pocket promises, alongside commitments to balance the budget, add police and take some of the sting out of welfare reform.

The list includes what would essentially be a new entitlement for poor and middle-income families: $1,500 to pay for a first year of community college or finance a portion of the higher costs of university.

All of that requires approval from a still-Republican congressional majority, a prospect conveniently overlooked in the Clinton campaign but a looming challenge now.

In these searching days after the election, leaders from both parties are cautious about how they will deal with each other and what actually might get done and lost.

"You start down the trail and you see how you do," Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss., said mildly.

Because of Clinton's centrist drift and appropriation of some GOP themes in the campaign, both parties share certain goals, including a balanced budget by 2002, tax relief, continued simplification of government rules and expansion of charter schools.

Clinton and his defeated GOP rival, Bob Dole, also joined in supporting the idea of a constitutional amendment on crime victims' rights.

The focus on balancing the books is supported by a recent record of deficit reduction on both sides and officials have been quick to emphasize that target will hold.

"We've got to balance the budget by... 2002," said Clinton spokesman Mike McCurry.

More broadly, McCurry says that "on many issues, Republicans and Democrats see eye to eye."

Still, that does not assure achievement. More than a year ago, Clinton and House Speaker Newt Gingrich shook hands to launch campaign finance reform and nothing happened.

Now both parties again promise action, and the final days of the campaign saw Clinton echoing Dole's proposal to restrict unlimited soft money and ban foreign contributions.

Already complications are rising. GOP leaders have taken one likely item of dispute with Democrats — banning the use of mandatory union dues for political action — and indicated they will make it a prerequisite for reform.

Similarly on taxes, Clinton and the Republicans both want cuts but differ so substantially on the size of them and how they would be paid for that no tax relief can be assumed at this point.

Clinton would pay for his cuts in part with corporate tax increases that Republicans would be reluctant to swallow. Republicans also complain that Clinton's six-year balanced budget plan is back-loaded — the toughest medicine coming in the final two years, when he will no longer will be president.

"That's not acceptable to us," said Sen. Don Nickles, R-Okla., the majority whip. "We are not going to have automatic tax increases in the sixth year to come up with a balanced budget."

All such complexities were set aside in the campaign as Clinton promised great strides in education, selected tax cuts and a balanced budget, and set out other markers by which he will be judged eventually.

"We must make two years of college just as universal in four years as a high school education is today," he vowed.

ROTC marks Vet's Day with annual all night vigil

By Daniel Follon

Taking a break from their busy schedules, students paused for a few moments yesterday in front of Memorial Hall as officers and cadets of the University of Massachusetts Air Force and Army ROTC programs held the annual Veteran's Day memorial ceremony.

See related story, page 3

The event was organized by Air Force ROTC Cadet Jared Conaboy and Army ROTC Cadet Steve Niggel.

According to Conaboy, the event was unique because "the Air Force and the Army don't usually do things together, so when we do, it's really big."

Although approximately 40 Air Force and Army personal were in attendance, the number of students was a quarter of that number.

"At a school like this there are a lot of people; it's very hard to get the word out, because it's a very liberal school," said Air Force ROTC Cadet Brooke Foley.

Father Quigley, a World War II veteran, gave the invocation, adding a touch of humor by portraying himself as "the liberator of most of northern Italy" during the U.S. military campaign in Italy.

Quigley then turned his remarks to

Gore expected to develop role & influence

By Jeannine Aversa
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The next four years offer Al Gore a tremendous advantage in the battle to succeed President Clinton: chance after chance to look presidential.

Gore, who has enjoyed remarkable influence for a vice president, is expected to have even more sway in his second term with an eye on the year 2000. For example, the White House's next political director almost certainly will have to have Gore's blessing. And Gore may have a say in changes at the Democratic National Commitee.

"He's already become the most powerful vice president in history," said White House advisor George Stephanopoulos. "That can only multiply in the second term."

Gore sidesteps most questions about how his second term role will differ from the first, but he allowed this much about the way he plans to help Clinton: "No doubt in the second term as different challenges confront him there will be times when he will ask me to take on new challenges in helping him," Gore said in an interview abroad Air Force Two on Wednesday. "But I don't know what they will be right now."

Echoing Clinton, Gore said second term priorities include balancing the budget, expanding access to education through tax credits and deductions, connecting the nation's classrooms to the Internet, protecting the environment and ensuring welfare works under new rules.

"Implementing the welfare reform law in a way that moves people into good jobs is clearly a very important part of the challenge in the second term," Gore said.

The vice president predicted Clinton's proposals would fare better in the new Congress, which remains controlled by Republicans. "I think that we have an excellent chance to build a very different relationship this Congress than we had in the last one," he said.

Even though the two men hardly knew one another until the 1992 campaign, Gore is now Clinton's closest advisor next to Hillary Rodham Clinton.

"The relationship between me and him has been terrific. Obviously it's even better now than it was when we started, and I expect that to continue to grow," Gore said.

Given that close relationship, any problems Clinton may have in his second term could rub off on Gore, although he rejects that notion.

"No, I don't think so," he said, adding that he's not worried about his image being tarnished by allegations of illegal campaign contributions from a fund-raiser he attended in April at a Buddhist Temple in California.

Taking an aggressive stance, Gore said the Clinton administration intends to move ahead on reforming the campaign financing system.

"I hope that in the aftermath of this election there will be a willingness on the part of people in both parties to really address this issue forcefully, aggressively and meaningfully," he said.

UMass ROTC trains at nearby Florence Armory

By Andee Fu
Collegian Correspondent

The Army Reserve Officer Training Corps (ROTC) at the University of Massachusetts conducted their field training on Nov. 2 and Nov. 3 at Florence Armory.

According to Cadet Commander William Ramsey, the purpose of this field exercise is to teach and evaluate all levels of cadets in a tactical environment. First, introducing the MS I (military science first year) cadets to military skills while encouraging them to further pursue of the program. Second, MS IIs and MS IIIs (second and third year cadets) are familiarized with STRAC (Squad, Tactic, Reaction, Assessment Course) and operation order.

Alpha company, which consists mostly of first year cadets, were taught how to assemble and disassemble a M-16 rifle. They were also challenged to a round robin competition which included two hand grenade courses, two paintball marksmanship courses, a low back crawl and a rope bridge course. Each of these events is intended to challenge the MS Is to stretch their physical and mental capacities.

The Bravo and Charlie companies (second and third year cadets respectively) were already acquainted with STRAC, an imitation of an actual war mission played out in a controlled environment. Individual cadet were given different responsibilities which tested their reaction and judgment under stressful situations.

"This field training will enhance the MS IIIs' leadership abilities while preparing them for Advance Camp," said Lt. Col. Muldawney.

As this field training indicated, the purpose of the whole Army ROTC is dedicated to the development of future officers within the Army (the official acceptance of an officer into the army).

"ROTC builds a person as a whole, which includes self discipline, and the discovering of one's own potential," said cadet First Lt. James Graham. "ROTC also provides a sense of direction for students who are still unsure about their life."

First-year cadets were introduced to basic military skills. Second-year cadets will learn the basic leadership skills with third-year students. As for third-year students, they go through intensive evaluation which will help to identify their strengths and weaknesses. Fourth-year cadets were given the responsibility of being battalion leaders.

ROTC is not only involved in building leaders, it also gives a person a chance to take part in the government, and gives women a chance to discover where their potential lies.

"ROTC contributed back to this campus with 130 students who are good models," said cadet Major Charles Moulton. "And brought back some of the traditions and prides of this University with Ranger Challenge competition nation wide."

"[The] Army defends our national interest, and where do these leaders come from?" Major Guelle said. "The leaders comes from the student body of colleges and universities."

the importance of Veteran's Day and participation in the memorial ceremony.

"Remembrance demands more of a citizen than it demands something that we are doing right now."

Cadets then placed six white roses in front of the Memorial Hall memorial slate. On each side of the slate, two cadets — one Army and one Air Force — will stand continuously from 11 a.m. Thursday to 11 a.m. on Friday.

Approximately 140 cadets from both branches will have participated in the vigil by Friday morning.

Closing ceremonies are planned for Friday and will begin in front of Memorial Hall at 10:10 a.m.

— A $1,500 tuition tax credit for the first year of post-secondary education, to be repeated the second year if the student maintains at least a B average and is not caught with drugs. It would start to be phased out for family incomes over $80,000 and eliminated for family incomes above $100,000.

— For those not taking the credit, a tax deduction of up to $10,000 a year for college expenses.

— A tax credit for pre-teen children starting at $300, rising to $500 and expiring in 2000. Republicans favor a tax credit for children up to age 18.

— Capital gains tax cut exempting up to $500,000 in profits for married couples who sell their homes. The exclusion would be $250,000 for singles. Republicans favor a broader capital gains tax cut.

— Penalty-free withdrawals from Individual Retirement Accounts for first home purchases, college tuition, major medical expenses or during long-term unemployment, and a doubling of income limits for tax-deductible IRA contributions. Dole largely agreed.

—Expanding work leave for visits to doctors' offices and parent-teacher conferences.

— Expanded Internet links to "every classroom" by 2000.

— Expanding the Brady law to prohibit people convicted of domestic violence from possessing firearms.

— Continuing a program to help communities hire 100,000 additional police officers.

For veterans visiting the Wall

Brad Bemis

The first step is to plan your trip. You must plan it in your mind, down to the last little detail. The last thing you need is a surprise. This trip will be tough enough without having to make other decisions along the way.

By now, your fears are high. But remember, you have overcome many obstacles to get this far. Your car is in good enough shape to make the trip; all the money you saved in the jar in the bedroom will pay your way; you have a motel reservation; AAA has sent you the TripTik with all the maps. Your mind is made up.

Today is your last appointment with your counselor before you leave on your trip tomorrow, but you're still wondering if you can make it all the way to the Wall. You know you want to, so badly you can almost taste it, your counselor has helped you all any outside person can. The rest is up to you.

You plan to leave around noon, which will put you at the Wall between 10 p.m. and midnight. You have planned your arrival for the time when the Wall belongs the vets.

The trip down is filled with thoughts. You worry some about the feelings that you will have to deal with at the Wall. You remember the good times you had with those whose names are engraved on the Wall. Then you remember when they died. You're getting closer — time to get the maps of Washington out. You're surprised to realize that the drive has taken less time than you thought it would: those memories sure made the time fly by.

You park the car and lock it. The Wall stands in front of you. Your knees are shaking. Once again, you feel the fear. Put on your jungle hat and jungle fatigue shirt, and 'Nam is back. Once more, you are part of the days gone by. As you start down the walk, the statue of three GI's appears first. Your first thought is to recon this place, you must get the lay of the land. As you circle the Wall, you see the Wall situated low in the ground, a few civilians standing in front of it, and the book of names inscribed on the Wall. After your third circle, you decide that there are no surprises here, and you go down towards the Wall.

It's time to look at the names. You have a pack of Luckys for Tex in your right hand; in your left hand is a nip of Johnny Walker Red, which Red asked for before he died. It is only 25 years late. As the walkway starts to drop into the angle of the Wall, you feel real cold, then real scared. Stop and catch your breath, you stand there, shaking. Relax, tell yourself, relax. As you start to walk again, the feeling starts to happen. You remember that everyone you talked to about going to the Wall talked about it. You are back, they are home: all is starting to get better. You begin to cry, silently, realizing that this has not happened to you since your first month in the 'Nam. At the Wall you have found feelings that were taken from you.

Things are moving fast now — too fast. You lean against the wall, tears running down your face, your knees shaking. Your feelings are indescribable, you lose all consciousness of time's passage as your mind races through memories of the war: the guys, the good times, the bad times. You smell the gun powder, the smell of death; you hear the voices of your buddies, the beating of the choppers int he air. Your head is spinning, and you need a break. You walk up, away from the Wall, but you find it real hard to leave. You turn and walk down the path, pacing up and down perhaps even 20 times. Finally you make it out.

The sun is coming up, and you must find coffee. After you gulp down a cup of coffee and wolf down a sandwich, you decide to sit down and relax for a while. You find the booth where the disabled vets sell souvenirs, and ask them about a place to rest. They invite you in to sit and talk, and you talk. Two hours later, you're feeling much better, and you head back to see the Wall in daylight.

As you approach the path, there is a crowd of people waiting to go in. You decide to stand in line so that you can take your time and take it easy, one step at a time — you'll have time to adjust that way. But as you join the line, people invite you to go ahead of them, showing you respect that you have never experienced before. It does feel good.

Brad Bemis is a UMass student.

So, what's new?

Nicole Cournoyer

I just want to warn you: this column has been written before. How could it not have been? Everything's already been said. Everything's already been done. As far as I can tell, the entire world is a rerun and we, as humans, have seen it all before. The show may have been good the first time around, but is it really worth watching over and over again?

Originality has always been a big issue with me. My earliest recollections of feeling the need to be original, an individual, have to do with good ol' Walt Disney. See, Disney taught me, when I was just a wee lass, that imagination was the most important thing a person can possess — or at least that's the lesson I learned from watching a purple dragon called Figment sing to me in Epcot Center. The ability to be imaginative made a person unique, special in some way. So really, what it comes down to is that I am not even the originator of my own desire to be original and creative.

I've always had this sense that if I could just find my core and speak from that, then I could come up with something that's never been said before. But is this really the case, given the fact that our experience as human beings is necessarily limited? Is there a "core" deep inside me that is like no one else's or are we all the same when the effects of culture and, generally, external stimuli are nullified or peeled back like layers of dead skin? I'm not sure which concept is more comforting — that I am a unique individual under all this conditioning or that we are all alike despite our outward differences. Personally, because I am a Disneyfied, rugged, American individualist, I think I'll go with the former.

I don't want to be like everyone else. I don't want to copy anyone — intentionally or unintentionally. I don't want to be just a variation on the blueprint of humanity. I want to be the only one of my kind because then it seems there is a purpose for my existence.

My desire to be my own person has not made my life an easy one. I was fairly depressed and antisocial as a child. Like any kid, I wanted to fit in, to belong, but when I did something unlike me, something that I knew I did just to "fit in," I hated myself for conforming, for lacking the strength to stand on my own. I distanced myself from everyone because I didn't want to be tainted by their influence on my pure soul. I wanted to get to the bottom of myself and live my life from there, and I couldn't do that with other people telling me what to do, how to act, what I should and should not be, what I should and should not think.

Of course, I failed whenever I tried to be original, and, not realizing that complete originality is probably impossible, I was depressed that I couldn't free myself from the traps of culture and biology and angry that I was not special enough to be original. In junior high, I wrote stories about the end of the world with twisted, ironic endings until I realized that I was copying Ray Bradbury.

My repulsion toward "following the crowd" probably, at some point, bordered on psychosis. I didn't want to wear what other people wore, walk the way other people walked, like the same things other people liked, read the same books, go to the same stores, or have the same opinions that other people did. I wanted to shave my head until it was the cool thing to do. I liked Pearl Jam until they got huge. Basically, I set out to stand out. I didn't want to be a follower.

My farm upbringing and the amount of hours I worked in the summer became more and more important to me because they set me apart. I didn't want to come to UMass because there were six other people from my high school coming here. I wanted to go into the military because no one from my all-girls high school was doing it, but I didn't want to copy my ex-marine brother. I wanted to go into agriculture but I didn't want to copy my father or brother. The last thing I wanted to do was become an English major along with 800 million other people.

But here I am: an English major at UMass who writes unoriginal columns for a newspaper and — yeah, OK — kind of likes Dave Matthews. Have I learned not to fight the inevitable? Have I sold myself out? Have I been whipped?

I've had to make allowances for the sake of my sanity, but I still crave the same individuality and specialness I always have. A little more cynical than I once was, I've come to believe that true originality is pretty much impossible — a belief that is frustrating and crippling to-an aspiring writer. However, I have also come to the conclusion that for some ideas, some actions, once is not enough. The same story sometimes has to be retold because you never know who missed it the first time around and because even those who have heard it before could use some reminding of the lessons it teaches. Perhaps originality is not something that erupts from within. Perhaps it involves working with what you have in the world — retelling the old tales in a new way and adding yourself to them with the telling.

Stretching nothing into something

Chris Stamm

After watching the returns during Tuesday's presidential election, I came to a frightening conclusion. Anything of significant political or social importance in our nation has to be transformed into a media circus.

In some instances, perhaps it may be acceptable to stretch out pointless pseudo-news stories such as the O.J. Simpson trial. Without over-analyzed garbage like that, what would all of the bored people in the world concern themselves with?

At the same time, the media cannot simply report on an important event, and this is what irked me most about Tuesday's election coverage. Instead of reporting on the returns as they came in, the networks choked viewers with "projected winners." Every two seconds it seemed like Joe Schmo was a shoe-in to win his race with 60 percent of the vote. However, in small print at the bottom of the screen, we were told that this 60 percent was only of the 2 percent of the precincts reporting.

I can see the point of trying to provide the viewer with the most accurate information possible, but at what point is the latest information stretched to fill space?

As I channel surfed throughout the night, I couldn't believe all the network gimmicks employed to attract attention. Anchors were surrounded by elaborate sets with graphics bouncing everywhere. At times I wasn't sure if I was watching results of the election or a Super Bowl halftime show.

Perhaps the most frightening aspect was the fact that I was sucked into it. I'll admit, the first time I saw Harry Smith walking around his "Cyber Set" with bar graphs materializing out of thin air, I was impressed. However, the more I thought about it, I didn't want coverage of the presidential election to look like something out of a Nintendo game.

I was playing right into their hands. While the format in which the information was presented to the viewer was catchy, it far out-weighed the actual relevance of the polls they portrayed. I really don't think the presidential election was meant to be such a flashy affair.

The numbers and statistics were flying around at a mile a minute, so fast that anchors could not keep pace with the data before them.

But I guess all of this just comes with the territory. If we want the most accurate and up to date coverage of the world around us, we have to rely on the wonders of modern technology. It all depends on just how the media uses it.

I can see it now — Dole 2000: 3-D. Now that's a scary thought.

A few complaints

To the editor:

I am writing in regard to a number of things I read in the Collegian on Wednesday, Oct. 30. The first and foremost of these appears in Christopher Hasset's opinion column "Examining Abortion." Here, Mr. Hasset makes a comparison between a woman carrying a baby and a person on life support.

The comparison being that terminating a person's life support when there was an almost certain recovery with time would be the equivalent of an abortion. Mr. Hasset calls this an "inventive point." Inventive, maybe, but not a valid one. The difference here is that a person on life support often requires only money, equipment and personnel to keep them alive.

As soon as the person requires any form of human organs, this is on a strictly voluntary basis. A mother carrying a child must supply everything to an unborn child (with the exception of money, that comes later.) Ever noticed that those people in the campus center who ask you to give blood always ASK? There's a reason for that. Giving away a part of you is not a requirement, even when it comes to saving another person's life. Giving away money to support other people is required of U.S. citizens, that's called taxes.

My second complaint with this edition of the Collegian is with Brad Davidson's portrayal of the security at the University Store. Comparing these security personnel to KKK members is way out of line. These officers made a mistake, they falsely accused an individual of stealing from the store, and the repercussions of that mistake are still being sorted out.

Their reason for making the original mistake was not nearly so vile as to warrant this particular criticism from Mr. Davidson. They observed an individual opening a container of a product sold in their store, taking a sample from it, and then not paying for it while exiting the store.

The exact nature of these questions is another story, but I wasn't there so I won't comment on how fair or unfair the "interrogation" was. My point is that Mr. Davidson is making the exact mistake he is condemning the security personnel of, making a broad generalization based only loosely on the facts.

Third, in Bryan Schwartzman's column about the Jewish population on campus, he cites two different sources giving contradictory estimates of the size of the Jewish population on campus. The first source says that 3500 students or 20% of the students here are Jewish. A little math will tell you that this implies a population of 17,500 students.

The second source says that 1200 or 12% of the student population is Jewish. This implies a student population of 10,000. Mr. Schwartzman then goes on to talk about the contradictions of these two sets of numbers. If he had used a calculator before hand, he would have realize that his sources were contradictory because they weren't even looking at the same populations, the first number is apparently all undergraduate students, while the second might be only those living on campus.

Residence programs needed

To the editor:

I am writing in response to Ann Rubinstein's editorial "So much for diversity" which was published in the Collegian on October 23. In her article, Rubinstein attacks ethnic Special Interest Residence Programs by calling the Asian/Asian- American floor, Native American floor, NUANCE Program, etc.

The main purpose of residence programs such as these is not to "segregate or discriminate" against the dominant culture. These programs attempt to create a safe living environment for people who are underrepresented at this University. These are often the only places on campus where certain groups are not underrepresented.

At an institution which is 76 percent white, according to Celina Chan's citing of Caplan College Information in Oct. 28th's Collegian, UMass residence life strives to create living environments where students of color (as well as GLBT identified students) can express themselves, preserve their cultures and identities without feeling threatened by the dominant culture.

The programs attempt fo provide a safe place where students can collaborate on projects and discuss issues which pertain to their communities, a place where underrepresented groups of people can feel they are not alone.

These special intcrest floors are a place for resources which are not easily accessible on other parts of campus. For instance, in Chadbourne, which houses the Native American floor, there is a Native American Cultural Center and library located in the basement. Programs such as these were demanded by students, they were created out of need.

Furthermore, Rubinstein's statement, "It is interesting to get a taste of all different kinds of people out there," leaves a bad taste in my mouth. People of color at this University are not here to whet anyone's palette. They are not here to diversify anyone's college experience. They are here to get an education.

Not so well written

To the editor:

In "Not so well fare," an editorial on Monday, Oct. 21, Andrew Trodden wrote that he was for welfare reform. It is true that welfare is in need of reform, but even the current legislation has gone too far. The key word here is reform, implying an improvement to an existing system, as compared to removal of the existing system, which is what Trodden is advocating.

What Trodden failed to realize is that welfare is much more than giving free money to "single teenage mothers," the stereotypical welfare recipient. Welfare is fuel assistance so that the poor do not have to freeze; welfare is food- stamps so that the poor do not starve; welfare is health-care for needy children, among other things.

Trodden advocated a government commission to regulate pregnancy (Pregnancy Approval Commission, PAC, Trodden called it) in order to solve the need for welfare. Besides being morally wrong and unconstitutional, it would not solve the real source of welfare recipients. Telling poor people they are not allowed to have children will not stop them, and to say that we would put the children of the poor up for adoption to save the children from abuse is just substituting one form of abuse for another. Who is to say that the love of the poor is worse than that of the rich?

To alleviate welfare, one must find the real source for welfare recipients. Although the stereotypical welfare recipient that may pop into your head may be "the single teenage mother," she is not the welfare recipient. To alleviate the teenage mother portion of the welfare recipients, we need to remove what makes the teenagers want to get pregnant, not jail them when they do become so, as Trodden suggests. And to alleviate the unemployed and temporarily unemployed we need tq educate them so they can get jobs and make their own jobs, as I am educating myself here so that I may better find work in the future.

Students head to convention

Brandeis, Tufts host regional college leadership conference

By Sarah J. Kimmel
Collegian Staff

Today 25 delegates from the University of Massachusetts Hillel will depart for Boston for the biannual American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) Policy Conference.

According to Jay Bragg, coordinator for the UMass delegation to the AIPAC conference, 525 students, representing 55 different colleges from Delaware to Maine, will gather at Brandeis and Tufts Universities for the Regional Political Leadership Training Seminar (RPLTS). Schools represented are UMass, Bates, Tufts, Brandeis, Cornell and Princeton, to name a few. These students will share ideas, opinions, experiences and questions about where they stand on American politics and Israeli–American relations.

This regional convention is comprised of a political leadership training seminar where students are advised on how to become stronger Jewish political activists on campus. The students also take classes in dealing with antisemitism in the media. The young adults are trained in how to fight the hatred that they experience on college campuses and in the real world after graduation. The students receive accurate information about the situations in Israel and the Middle East as well.

Training in how to evaluate both national and local election results and what they mean for United States affairs, both domestic and international, is provided. This helps the students to finalize voting decisions as well as act politically after the election results are in. The students discuss whether the newly elected officials will benefit or damage Israeli– American relations.

Also included in the conference is a Shabbaton at Brandeis, an optional trip to Boston, a cruise around Boston Harbor and dinner on the Spirit of Boston on Saturday night.

Steve Grossman, former chairman of the Massachusetts Democratic Party as well as the past president of AIPAC and present chairman of the AIPAC board, will also be attending. Grossman spoke to UMass students last year at the request of the UMass Hillel.

Senior Jay Bragg, a BDIC major, is helping to run this trip for the UMass Jewish Community. Bragg and the other students attending the conference hope to return "more focused on the issues." He feels that this trip gives students the "opportunity to express themselves. It gives them a voice where they normally would be without one."

This spring there will be an international AIPAC convention in Washington, DC where President Clinton will speak. For more information contact Jay Bragg at Hillel.

Changing our perception

Steve Gold

It was not until this past year that I acquired a firm understanding of the situation in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. In order to understand, I had to overcome years of propaganda that I had been exposed to.

I was brought up in a Jewish household. I was educated as a few. I was given abundant information on the subject of the occupied territories over many years, and was always encouraged to believe and support the Jewish viewpoint.

During the same period of my Jewish education, I heard various accounts of the events in the territories from another point of view. So many times I heard rhetoric about the legitimacy of the existence of the State of Israel. I heard pontifications on the international conspiracies involving Jews and Israel. I heard calls for the destruction of the "Jewish Homeland."

And then this year, I attended a discussion on the Palestinian situation and, for the first time, received what seems to be facts. I listened to an Armenian man, a former professor and now consultant on Middle East affairs, and an Israeli woman talk about the plight of the Palestinian people in Israel. They discussed roads being built within the Palestinian village from another, complete Israeli control over water allocation within the territories and the economic strife caused by Israeli border–closings.

This presentation, unlike most, had no special interests. The two speakers presented information from a humanist point of view, not a Jewish or Palestinian, or Arab point of view. From them, I learned that in order for peace to be implemented in the Middle East, there needs to be a purging of special interest and ideology, there and here. The Palestinian issue is one of human rights, not fundamentalism.

Unfortunately, such opportunities to receive information untainted by personal biases are few. Most exposure of the Israeli/Palestinian conflict comes through American media: television, radio, newspapers. As such, single events (Islamic fundamentalist attacks, Jewish fundamentalist rhetoric) are picked out and serve to represent the issue. The focus is on individual safety or law–breaking; there is no focus on the safety and comfort of a whole nation of people or laws that oppress them.

I have had the opportunity to witness some of the poverty and squalor of Palestinians in Jerusalem first hand. And I had the good fortune to be in Jerusalem the day Rabin and Arafat shook hands on the White House lawn. But even though I have seen what Israel looks like, I, too, have been a victim of misinformation. I have for so long been convinced that a hand shake means peace, a bus bombing means Islamic radical and Palestinians are hate–mongering wretches.

For the past three years, beginning with the signing of the Oslo Accords, and especially in this past year with the election of Netanyahu and the "break–down" of the "peace process," all Americans have been hard–pressed to consider the situation in Israel and the occupied territories. Shamefully, most of the information on the subject which enjoys widespread circulation pits Jews against Arabs, Israelis against Palestinians, causing us to choose sides — ultimately dividing us.

However, the true nature of the situation — not being an Arab/Jewish conflict nor a Palestine/Israel conflict — but one of human rights, assumes that there is no side to be taken other than a humane one.

Steve Gold is a UMass student.

The facts of the matter

Guy Chayoun

The University of Massachusetts campus deserves the true facts concerning the situation in the Middle East in order to deduce accurate opinion about the peace process and its implications. Many times the printed material is skewed, and fictitious facts are presented to the public as truths. Here are some facts that you may not have known about Israel and the Palestinian situation which will help you in understanding the ever evolving peace process that originated in 1992 with the Oslo Accords.

Some Facts:

- Prior to the establishment of the State of Israel, 70 percent of the land in Palestine was British owned, which then was passed to the Israeli government under international law in 1948.
- During the period from 1920 to 1948, 90 percent of the land that the Jews occupied was purchased from absent wealthy Arab land holders, or uninhabited land that was passed over to Israel under international law.
- In 1944, Jews paid between $3,000 to $1,100 per acre in Palestine, mostly for arid or semi–arid land. According to the U.S. Department of Agriculture, that same year, rich black soil is Iowa was selling for about $110 per acre.
- Until 1970, the Israeli government had a policy of repayment or replacement for anyone who could prove ownership of land prior to 1948, only 10 percent of the Arab refugees took advantage of the policy.
- A United Nations estimate claims that property loss of the Jews expelled from Arab countries after 1948 was 10 times the loss of the Palestinian Arabs.
- In 1948, any Arab who remained within Israel's borders was granted automatic citizenship including full voting rights and the right to establish political parties. The majority of the residents chose to flee the territory anticipating a swift Arab defeat of Israel.
- From 1920 to 1948 the Jews were willing to accept a partition of the land that would have granted them 20 percent of the current size of Israel, the Arabs refused.
- The Israeli population of 5.5 million (1 million of whom are Arab) is surrounded by 220 million Arabs in the neighboring countries, many of which are still hostile towards Israel.
- Israel is slightly smaller than the state of New Jersey.

Some enlightening words:

"If the negotiations reach a dead end, we shall go back to the struggle and strife, as we did for 40 years. It is not beyond our capabilities..." — Nabil Shaath, Planning Minister and leading Palestinian Authority negotiator.

"If I have information about terror activity in Area B, I won't give it to the Israelis." — Jibril Rajoub, Head of Palestinian secret policy for the West Bank.

"When we stopped the Intifada we did not stop the Jihad to establish Palestine with Jerusalem as our capital... We know only one word: Jihad, Jihad, Jihad... We are at conflict with the Zionist Movement... " — Yasser Arafat, Oct. 1996.

"If Israel rejects our demands there will be a reaction and we have a 30,000 man armed force." — Yasser Arafat, June, 1996.

"The Israelis are mistaken if they think we do not have an alternative to negotiations. By Allah they are wrong. The Palestinian people are prepared to sacrifice the last boy and the last girl so that the Palestinian flag will be flown over the wall, the churches and the mosques of Jerusalem." — Yasser Arafat, Aug. 1995.

"Without full Palestinian rights with a Palestinian state with East Jerusalem as its capital there won't be peace... We can't rule out return to the gun. If Israel can't meet its obligations the peace will be destroyed." — Yasser Arafat, April, 1996.

"The struggle will continue until all of Palestine is liberated." — Yasser Arafat, Nov. 1995

Hopefully some of these facts and quotes will allow the University population to critically think about the current situation in the Middle East. People need to question the Palestinians' true intentions in the Middle East peace process. I believe that peace is an attainable objective, but it is important to know exactly what is being discussed at the negotiation table, and who is involved in the discussion.

Hillel offers trips to Israel, kosher meals

By Sarah J. Kimmel
Collegian Staff

On your way down North Pleasant Street check out that big khaki building with a huge picture window out front. That's the Hillel House and it doesn't say "Welcome" on the front window for no reason.

The Hillel House is not just a place to attend Shabbat and holiday services — though the services there are beautifully run, not only by adults, but by students as well.

The House offers everything, from kosher meals in their new kitchen to trips to Israel. Any Jewish student can now get a kosher Shabbat dinner by transferring a meal off their meal plan for no additional cost.

Unknown to many, the Hillel House offers several one credit courses that are open to students. Last year a class included a semester long project that combined Jewish art history and a hands–on mural creation by the students. Courses next semester include "Jewish Vegetarianism," "The Sabbath in Kabbalah," "Community and Cyberspace" and "Divisions and Conflicts in Israeli society."

The Jewish Living Community (JLC) is made up of approximately 20 UMass students who live in the Hillel House instead of a residence hall or other off–campus apartment. These students sleep, eat, study and socialize in the building.

One such student, Adam Buxbaum, a senior sports management major, said he really enjoys living in the JLC.

"Being at Hillel allows you to feel like a Jewish student on campus. It allows you to explore your Jewish roots, meet other Jewish students, study on campus and explore your Judaism," he said.

Buxbaum also emphasized that Hillel is "a community where you live with 20 other people, not 300. It's a true community."

Hillel also helps to sponsor several programs such as the recent Music of the Holocaust concert and the upcoming trip to Israel in December. In past years, Hillel has helped sponsor several speakers like Morris Dees, who spoke about anti–Semitism In America, and Elie Wiesel and Maya Angelou who spoke before 6,000 students in the Mullins Center.

Next time you see that Welcome sign, don't just walk on by. Walk in and check out what's going on inside.

Fantasy and Reality in the Collegian

The following is a statement from the media–watchdog group, CAMERA (Committee for Accuracy in Middle East Reporting in America):

Hussein Ibish has been an anti–Israel agitator in the pages of the Daily Collegian for quite some time. His columns are invariably filled with inaccuracies, half–truths and falsehoods. The Oct. 22nd full–page article "Fantasy and reality in Zionist colonial thought" is no exception — once again revealing the author's utter contempt for the facts. Let us examine the fantasy and reality in Ibish's article.

Hussein claims "virtually the entire Yishuv (Jewish settler community), of all different political stripes, believed in the principle and necessity of transfer" and goes on to cite (among others) the heads of the two major parties of the Yishuv, Vladimir Jabotinsky and David Ben–Gurion. Ibish's claim is a complete inversion of the truth.

First of all, the idea of transferring Arabs out of the future Jewish state was proposed not by the Jews, but by the British. The notion was put forth in the recommendations of the 1937 Peel Royal Commission on Palestine (see "Rewriting Israel's History," Ephraim Karsh, Middle East Quarterly, June 1996).

However, Jewish leaders categorically rejected the idea of mandatory transfer. Joseph Schechtman, in The Life and Times of Vladimir Jabotinsky, provides Jabotinsky's response to the Peel Commission's proposal: "He called this 'evacuation prattle... worse than preposterous: It is, from the Jewish viewpoint, down right criminal... What an instructive precedent indeed for Jew–baiters all over the world,' he exclaimed. "Until now, in our Zionist and Revisionist propaganda, we always held steadfastly and religiously to the principle that nobody shall be driven out! We are striving to attain a majority, not to show the minority the door."

Ben–Gurion was similarly opposed to the transfer of Arabs out of Palestine, going on record publicly against transfer just prior to the establishment of Israel. During the War of Independence, on July 6, 1948, Ben–Gurion gave the following general order to all IDF units: "DISCIPLINE: Except in actual battle it is prohibited to destroy, burn or ruin Arab cities and villages, to expel Arab inhabitants from villages, neighborhoods and cities, or to evict inhabitants from their domicile without special permission or explicit instruction, in each and every individual case, from the Minister of Defense. Violators of this order will be prosecuted" (cited by Shabtai Teveth in "The Palestine Arab Refugee Problem and Its Origins," Middle Eastern Studies, June 1990).

Ibish not only completely falsifies the views of the Yishuv's leaders, but he also ignores evidence that conflicts with his view of present–day Israel. Ibish laments that "transfer and ethnic cleansing, so deeply rooted in Zionist history and tradition, remains the realistic and unspoken fear of every Palestinian living under Israeli rule." Again, this is an assertion without any basis in reality. The non– Jewish population within the "Green Line" and in the territories both have grown dramatically, not declined. The Druze, Christian and Moslem population in Israel has risen from 158,000 in 1949 to 1,011,300 in 1994 (Central Bureau of Statistics, Statistical Abstract of Israel 1995). The total population in the territories has risen from 966,700 at the end of 1967 to 1,832,800 at the end of 1993 (approximately 134,000 of which were Jews). Moreover, if the idea of transfer is so pervasive, why did Moledet, the party advocating transfer, receive only two of 120 Knesset seats in the recent Israeli election?

Ibish is also wildly inaccurate when he claims that "during the 1948 war, almost 1,000,000 Palestinians were expelled from Palestine." The United Nations Mediator on Palestine put the number of refugees at 472,000 (Progress Report of the United Nations Mediator on Palestine, Submitted to the Secretary–General for Transmission to the Members of the United Nations, General Assembly Official Records: Third Session, Supplement No. 11 (A\648), Paris, 1948, p. 47 and Supplement No. 11A (A\689 and A\689/Add. 1, p. 5)).

And were all of these refugees "expelled"? Hardly. Initially those leaving were primarily the Palestinian leadership. 75,000 members of the Palestinian elite fled, leading Britain's Chief Secretary for Palestine, Sir Henry Gurney, to write "It is pathetic to see how the... Arabs have been deserted by their leaders." Much of the remaining population subsequently panicked and fled. The Arab Higher Committee, the National Committees, officers of Jordan's Arab Legion and commanders of the Arab Liberation Army issued explicit instructions to the Arab masses to leave, warning that failure to comply would thwart the Jihad against the Jews.

An Arab refugee was quoted in the Jordanian daily Al Difaa: "The governments told us, 'Get out so we can get in.' So we got out but they did not get in" (September 6, 1948). Ibish also ignores the documented evidence of Jewish efforts to stem the Arab flight. Golda Meir has recounted her futile attempts (on Ben–Gurion's orders) to persuade the Arabs not leave their homes in Haifa: "But they had only one answer; 'We know that there is nothing to fear, but we have to go. We'll be back.' I was sure that they went, not because they were frightened of us, but because they were terrified of being considered traitors to the Arab 'cause.' At all events, I talked myself blue in the face, and it didn't help" (Golda Meir, My Life).

And of course no mention is made of the Jewish refugee problem: more than 750,000 Jews fled or were expelled from Arab countries hostile to the new–born Jewish state.

Readers of Ibish's column will notice that he omits references for many of his citations. Could it be that he has distorted these quotations (or worse), and does not want his distortions exposed? If he stands by his incendiary charges, let him cite chapter and verse for each of them.

In a fabricated story about the refugee ship, the Patria, in a Nov. 1995 Collegian article, Ibish sited a particular book as evidence, saying "readers are encouraged to consult" It. CAMERA did exactly that, and found Ibish to be 100 percent wrong. Ibish knows he was wrong as well. Why else remain silent about CAMERA's rebuttal in a March Collegian letter to the editor? If Ibish can somehow explain his distortion of primary sources in the Patria case, let him to do so. Continued silence will be taken as confirmation that he cannot.

Joshua Chadajo is the Research Coordinator for CAMERA.

This is the first jewish affairs page of the semester. It was designed as a focus page to complement the coverage that has been in the news, arts and ed–op sections of our paper. We are trying to cover fairly and accurately, different aspects of Jewish life on campus, so that we can educate students about the many facets of Jewish culture. We will also provide forum for students to express their concerns and points of view about Israel and the on–going peace process. If you are interested in writing, or have any suggestions come down to the campus center basement and ask to speak to Bryan Schwartzman or Sarah Kimmel, or call them at the Collegian at 545–1851.

Through an enlightened press, education and understanding can simultaneously occur.

"Interpretation" can be an ugly word when applied to Shakespeare. Whether it's Measure for Measure filled with modern-day whores and pimps, or Richard III as a fascist tyrant in a fictional 1930's England, the idea of someone taking a timeless classic and putting their stamp upon it initially smacks of egotism upon the part of the interpreter.

However, interpreting Shakespeare has always been natural in our lives. Both live productions and films have to cut from the original text in order to trim the running time. For example, if every word was said from Hamlet, the length would be over four hours. Stalwarts with that kind of endurance can look forward to Kenneth Branagh's take on that moody Dane in a few weeks.

The new Romeo & Juliet by director Baz Luhrmann (Strictly Ballroom) goes beyond simply cutting for content. Luhrmann moves the play from the Italian Verona of past to a fictional modern-day Verona Beach which looks like a neon Mexico City on crystal meth, but where everyone speaks English.

What sounds like a silly idea should make a silly movie, but Luhrmann insists on infusing the scenes with a garish iconography that works: neon crosses line the nave of Father Laurence's church, the Virgin Mary grins from the handle of Tybalt's handgun (the word "sword" etched on the side), Juliet is dressed as an angel at her clan's costume party.

The modern sensibilities go far beyond sticking a cross on everything, though. Shakespeare's original chorus is now spoken by a TV anchorwoman as those fateful words flash upon the screen: "Two households, both alike in dignity..." The first five minutes are a dizzying array of editing and loony stunts that are reminscent of Desperado, Robert Rodriguez's gun-blazing sequel to El Mariachi, filled with unbelievable stunts that are still riveting.

Leonardo DiCaprio does an adequate job keeping up with the language, but he still looks like he's wearing an uncomfortable tie the whole time. His contributions lie with his pretty looks and his ability to look more manic than any other teenager acting today.

The strongest point of Romeo & Juliet comes unquestionably with Claire Danes as Juliet. Danes continues to be the most exciting young actress working today. Since her arrival into our collective lives as Angela Chase, the down-trodden teenager on ABC's "My So-Called Life," all Danes has ever needed to do is cry to send a chill down her audience's spines. B+

A braver, newer cowboy

By Bradley Skaught
Collegian Staff

If there is a reigning king of country music, then his palace lies far from the slick assembly lines of Nashville. Instead he resides in the whispery flatlands of west Texas — a place that has given birth to some of country music's most innovative and exciting artists, not the least of whom is Jimmie Dale Gilmore.

Touring in support of his breathtaking new album, Braver Newer World, Gilmore will bring his beautiful voice and incredible collection of songs to the Iron Horse on Sunday Nov. 10, and it promises to be one of the most exciting shows this year.

Those unfamiliar with Gilmore's work will probably not recognize his name from country radio or TNN. Gilmore is an outsider — one of the many great west Texas musicians who have managed to re-invent and re-invigorate country music (some of the others include Joe Ely, Terry Allen and Robert Earl Keen Jr.) despite a lack of commercial airplay.

Gilmore's recording career began back in the early '70s when he and some fellow Lubbock, Texas, friends (including Joe Ely and Butch Hancock) formed The Flatlanders, a group who saw one single and an album disappear without a trace (the album has recently been reissued by Rounder Records as More a Legend Than a Band). After that Gilmore disappeared from the recording industry for almost 15 years, appearing only in the songwriting credits of artists who remembered the wonderful songs he had penned.

Gilmore's recording comeback began in the late '80s with a couple of records for Hightone, the same label as his old friend Joe Ely. The records were far from perfect, but they reintroduced the world to Gilmore's amazing talent and led the way to After Awhile, a breakthrough album that won the praise of critics and country fans alike, topping most of the year end top 10 lists. The follow up, Spinning Around the Sun, failed to capture the magic of After Awhile, but Braver Newer World more than made up for it.

Produced by T–Bone Burnett, and featuring such musicians as Jon Brion, Jim Keltner and Greg Liesz, Braver Newer World is a sprawling, awe inspiring masterpiece — a perfect marriage of Gilmore's lonesome wail and Burnett's genre hopping arrangements. Gilmore has always claimed to be far more than just a country musician, and Braver Newer World amply demonstrates the diversity and immensity of his talent — a talent that will be a grace to the Iron Horse stage, and blessing to all the true country believers in the audience.

Jimmie Dale Gilmore performs at the Iron Horse Music Hall Sunday night at 7 p.m. Tickets are $16.50. The show is all ages.

Murphy's Law, Agnostic Front to play in December

On Tuesday night I had the great pleasure of witnessing Avail play at the Middle East. The band was great but what really struck me was how amazing the crowd was. Everyone sung along, kids danced and respected each other and people were actually interested in meeting each other — a fine example of what a positive hardcore scene can be like.

For people in the area on Monday night at midnight, check out the Neato Punk Rock show hosted by Mellissa Emmerit on WMUA. While the show leans to the poppier side of things, she mixes in enough hardcore to keep things interesting.

• Chamberlin/ Old Pike split 7-inch on Doghouse — I loved Split Lip, I like Chamberlin, I love R.E.M., I love the packaging on this 7-inch. That said, this release flat out sucks. Old Pike try to be a southern version of R.E.M. and fall flat on their faces. "Magnetic 62nd" the first Chamberlin song (which is also on the Anti comp) is an amazing emotional song that gives me chills and a sense of nostalgia. The B-side is an acoustic song that was recorded in a bathroom and should have been left there.

• Baby Gopal S/T on Victory — This is not hardcore, this is not even remotely related to hardcore and this should not be on Victory Records. I love female fronted bands but Baby Gopal make Ashes and Samuel look like the Cro–Mags. This stuff is better left to major labels and MTV.

• Damnation Misericordia 10" on Jade Tree — Well at least this release is hardcore — the newer kind of hardcore. A lot of people compare these guys to Negative FX and bands of their ilk because this is angry and loud. On this release it is more fitting because it is less metal than their full length. On the other hand the songs are too long and I have trouble believing life is that hard and depressing for a bunch of middle class, white, suburban kids. What happened to PMA? It also includes five live songs that have surprisingly good sound quality.

• On Dec. 14th at the Wetlands, in New York, is the Agnostic Front reunion show. While I generally frown on bands getting back together to gain respect (money) this is one I'm looking forward to. Besides the fact that Agnostic Front is one of my all time favorite bands, all of the members have been involved in recent projects showing that they never turned their backs on the scene. Plus it will probably be one of the most active, crazy, crowds at a show in a long time.

• Murphy's Law will be playing Pearl Street on Dec. 6th. Opening up are Fastbreak, an amazingly fun and energetic posi-core band from Connecticut. It's nice to see the above two bands who have different views playing together.

• The new issue of Change Zine is out and as usual it is one of the best reads available. Finally a 'zine that is not afraid to speak its mind.

• Attention local bands and anyone involved in the scene — if you have demo's, 7–inches, zines, shows or anything that you would like mentioned, drop me a line at 545–3500 or e–mail me at skaught@student.umass.edu. Thanks.

Tuva delights with its unique music

World music is a tricky category. What exactly makes a piece of music fit into this particular genre? It's not the style—innovative, new–wave dance music from Morocco and traditional folk music from Ghana are both marketed as world music. There's a strong ethnocentric bias in using the world category—basically, anything that's not from the U.S. goes in it.

However, even some styles from the United States, for example Cajun, are classified as World rather than Folk music. So we see that the category itself is a bit nebulous, and easily subject to criticisms. However, almost anyone who is handed a CD will agree on whether or not to classify it as world, and so we do have a category which is for the most part agreed on.

I will try to keep these questions in mind, while using the term "world" for the time being.

Creating music is a basic human trait, and the variety of music that springs up across the earth is fascinating. The music of Tuva is especially interesting. Located between Eastern Russia and Northern China, Tuva has a history of rich influences, including Buddhist and shamanic chanting, Rüssian folk music, and more recently, western musics like blues and rock.

The basic traditional style of Tuva remains the höömei, or throat–singing. In this singing, the vocal cords are tightened in such a way that the singer can create several notes simultaneously. In this way, a single singer can learn to voice a note, its fourth, and the octave above the note.

Within höömei there are a number of more specific styles. Sygyt has traditional descriptions such as "the song of birds." Höömei proper has three to four notes sung, with the mouth rounded and the tongue moving to create the melody. This style's sometimes described as "wind swirling among the rocks." Kargyraa involves making tones an octave below the fundamental and is compared to the sound of a mother camel who has lost her child.

These basic styles can be embellished in numerous ways: trills produced on the lips, höömei sung with the mouth closed, pulsating the throat, etc. For an idea of what höömei sounds like, think of the oscillating tones made by an air– conditioner or someone tuning a guitar. It's amazing that these notes are all produced by a single human throat.

Tuvan music is further complemented by an array of native instruments. The igil is a two–stringed fiddle, the limbi a type of flute; byzaanchy is a four–stringed fiddle whose bow is locked between the strings, and the doshpuluur is a Tuvan banjo. The most popular percussion comes from the dungur, a hand drum used by shamans.

For anyone interested in learning more, the Tuvan band Hun Huu Tuur has a number of CD's out on which they perform in many of the various styles of Tuvan music. There are also several Tuvan various artists CD's. Ralph Leighton has also written a book, Tuva or Bust, about his experiences seeking out Tuva and its music during the difficult Cold War era, when Tuva suffered under great repression.

do, and I'm confident that they can step it up."

The volatile down–low scoring trio of Brian Stahl (68 goals), Aldo Roman (19) and J.C. Limardo (21) will be looked upon to carry the scoring load, but also to be more consistent in staying out of foul trouble, and keeping themselves in the water with intelligent play.

Freshman Rich Slingluff leads the Minutemen with 89 quarters played, appropriate considering he was tabbed to take up the majority of the slack for the loss of Marc Staudenbauer, last year's most durable player.

Slingluff has had an impressive all–around inaugural campaign. The youngster out of Navy country (Annapolis, Md.) has become a consistent scoring threat for UMass notching 28 goals, a mark that ranks him third on the team behind Stahl and Gabriel Marrero (41). Slingluff has eight assists on the year and has recorded a stellar .583 shooting percentage.

"It's been difficult this year to get the team functioning as a unit," Yarworth said. "I've done all I can; it's up to them now."

and we'll have to work strong against those defensemen to win."

The key though is still finding a way to stop the Wildcats, as coach Dick Umile's teams have a reputation for a wide– open style of play led by quick forwards.

Few were stunned when the plans for UNH's new Whittemore Center included a larger rink to amplify this advantage that UNH holds over most teams.

"This is a good offensive machine," Mallen said. "They have five very good forwards [Mowers, Boguniecki, Nickulas, Nolan and Jason Krcg]. They play very well defensively too.

"We're going to have to get some quality shots on goal and play tight in our defensive zone against UNH. The key is trying to stop their top five guys, and keep some pressure on [UNH goalie Brian] Larochelle."

UMass will look to its second and third lines to provide consistent support of its top line of Tom Perry, Rob Bonneau and Warren Norris. Depth should be a factor in how this weekend's series plays out, with the bulk of UNH's offense coming from its top two lines.

Fourth line matchups will go a long way in determining this weekend's winners.

Minuteman Notes: The UMass hockey office is doing its part to make its tickets more accessible to UMass students. In addition to regular pickups with a valid activity card at the Curry Hicks Cage box office, UMass hockey tickets can now be picked up at the table in the Campus Center concourse and Tix in the Student Union, in addition to the Mullins Center box office, before each game.

that leaving Jeff in the game would affect his confidence. But Jeff is our quarterback."

The Minutemen wrap up the 1996 season next Saturday when traditional rival UConn comes to Amherst. Game time is scheduled for 12:30 p.m.

■ volleyball

La Salle's only A–10 victory came against St Bonaventure in five games on Oct. 19. Its only other win also came at home — another 3–2 win, over Loyola (Md.) two matches earlier.

On Tuesday, UMass (21–7, 9–4 A–10) beat intrastate rival Harvard in three straight games, 15–9, 15–2, 15–5. Freshman Sarah Watters and Jill Meyers combined for 27 kills and only two errors in 49 attempts (.510). Meyers leads the team with a .525 hitting percentage. Senior outside hitter Dionne Nash added 10 kills with only one error.

"We started off slow against Harvard," Pearce said. "But eventually we were able to get things going. This weekend we're going to try and build from where we left off Wednesday night."

Minutewomen Notes: UMass is hoping a certain trend will continue. It is 12–1 at Curry Hicks Cage this season... It's 14–3 in three–game matches... UMass is 2–2 in five– game matches, 3–1 on neutral sites... at every UMass home match, there's a 50/50 raffle, with winning tickets that enable the holder to walk out onto the court and try to serve a volleyball over the net, and hopefully onto a respective prize.

William & Mary (1–0), upset then–No. 10 Virginia (2–1), and tie No. 10 Wisconsin by a score of 2–2 in last weekend's University of Kentucky Invitational.

GW coach Shannon Higgins–Cirovski had more than her schedule to thank for her team's success: she has the Vogel sisters, midfielders Tanya and Jennifer. Tanya leads the team in both goals (12) and points (25) scored this season, with Chemar Smith second with 22 points (9g, 4 a). Traci Jensen (1.40 GAA) has had former Minutewoman Skye Eddy assisting with her goal–keeping, so the UMass coaching staff knows GW will be prepared for a close game.

"[Cirovski] has a good class of kids who are now older, and more mature, and a goalkeeper who can win games for them with her acrobatics," Rudy said.

Chamides agreed.

"GW has one of the better two fronts that we've seen through the course of the season, and combined with their two front is a strong cast, with the Vogel sisters in the midfield," Chamides said.

At the end of this weekend, both teams will have their own respective postseason fates in their hands. The championship game on Sunday versus either Dayton or Fordham will be important in itself, but admittedly, this will be the game of the weekend.

For Rudy, he sees his team on the bubble of the bubble for NCAA's. The importance of this weekend's success for both team's stands in the here and now, but down the road, it is important for both teams, and their conference.

"If they beat us, they are in for sure, and if they don't, there is a question," Rudy said. "They might make it, they might not. We hope like heck, regardless, that we both make it, because that is the only way the NCAA selection committee is going to take our conference seriously if we get more than one team in.

"So, we're really the A–10's ticket for the future. We almost have to do it this year before we go to the full 11 team schedule next year, which will really reduce the overall strength of team schedule."

HOROSCOPES

ARIES
March 21–April 20

Focus on building up your savings. There could be a rainy day coming up, and being prepared early is your best course of action. Don't fall under a shallow person's charms. There could be an ulterior motive at work—and a shady one, at that.

TAURUS
April 21–May 21

You don't have to tell everything you know, even if someone asks. And this week in particular, silence would be the best course of action. Fear is a great motivater, but it also paralyzes. Think your options through and then take action.

GEMINI
May 22–June 21

Gear up for a busy week. Get down to business and you'll beat a tight deadline. Don't be shy in asking for all the relevant information, either. Next time, plan ahead a little further, and your performance will be even more impressive.

CANCER
June 22–July 22

Ask for financial advice before you start a new savings program. Avoid the temptation to go on a spending spree—leave the plastic at home. An older friend has some wisdom to share about a problem that's been troubling you.

LEO
July 23–August 23

You're at your best during an unplanned meeting. A romantic reavon sparks your interest in a new way. You might want to make a commitment—it's a good time for that. A mutual admiration society gives you a chance to do more than talk.

VIRGO
August 24–September 22

You're footloose and fancy-free this week—mundane tasks hold no interest for you. If deadlines loom, give yourself a strict time frame for being irresponsible and carefree—then force yourself to stick to it. It's hard, but you may be inspired.

LIBRA
September 23–October 23

It's impossible to keep all your options open this week, so resign yourself to the fact that you must make a decision, and then do it. Once it's made, don't look back. Second-guessing yourself would risk all the progress you've made to date.

SCORPIO
October 24–November 22

A pleasant tone in your voice will sugarcoat even the bitterest pill. Be very clear, both to yourself and to others, about what you expect, and you'll be happy with the outcome. Extend a deadline if you need more time—focus on quality, not quantity.

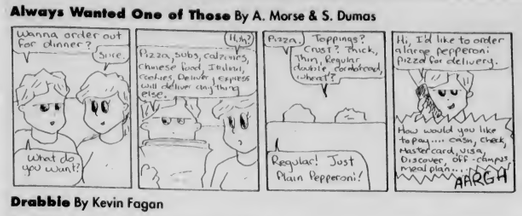
SAGITTARIUS
November 23–December 21

A burdensome situation won't ease until you take decisive action. Plan a reward for yourself for after you do something particularly difficult—treat yourself and a friend to a movie, or just take time to talk with someone you miss very much.

CAPRICORN
December 22–January 20

Although right now it feels like you have got it all, it's important that you don't neglect the feelings of someone close to you. Especially if you are busy at work, you could be ignoring some fairly serious cries for attention. Someone close to you gives you good advice that is pertinent to your job.

AQUARIUS
January 21–February 18



Don't give up your goals in response to a small setback. Instead, focus on the objectives that lead to your goals. You may be due for a difficult lesson—the more open you are to suggestions, the better off you'll be.

PISCES
February 19–March 20

Stick to family when it comes to discussing personal matters. Although it's tempting to bare your soul elsewhere, this week it would be a bad idea. Stay out of the limelight—someone could grow even more envious than they already are.

Minutemen head to Atlantic 10 Tournaments

Perfect field hockey garners tourney's top seed

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts–Temple.

The mention of these schools conjures up images of heated arguments, hard-fought games and a full-fledged collegiate sports rivalry.

That rivalry will be on display this weekend, when the Massachusetts field hockey team faces the Temple Owls in the first round of the Atlantic 10 tournament tomorrow at noon in Philadelphia.

ATLANTIC 10 FIELD HOCKEY TOURNAMENT
at St. Joseph's University
Philadelphia, PA
— SATURDAY —
12 p.m. UMass vs. Temple
2 p.m. URI vs. LaSalle
— SUNDAY —
1 p.m. Championship Game

In other tourney action, Rhode Island and La Salle are set to tangle in the afternoon's second game at 2 p.m. The winners of Saturday's contest will play on Sunday afternoon at 1 p.m. in the A–10 Championship game.

The No. 9 Minutewomen (14–5) received the top seed in the tournament by virtue of their spotless conference record. UMass finished the A–10 regular season 5–0, and clinched the in-season title with a 2–0 win over St. Joseph's on Nov. 2.

For the first time in conference history, an automatic berth to a NCAA play–in game is at stake in the tournament. The winner will advance to face the winner of the Mid–America conference on Nov. 12.

When UMass squared off against Temple earlier in the season on Geassy Field in Philly, the Minutewomen prevailed 3–1, with Sharon Hughes tallying the game– winning goal. That upped UMass' all–time record against the Owls to 18–5.

Temple (6–13, 2–3) is trying for its second A–10 tournament title in three years, having won the title in 1994, when Owl coach Lauren Fuchs was named conference coach of the year.

"We need to play well for 70 minutes," Fuchs said. "It's anyone's gain, but UMass doesn't need any incentive against us."

The Owls are led by Cherifa Nouri, who scored Temple's only goal against the Minutewomen in October. Nouri has notched 13 goals and a pair of assists to earn 28 points over the season. Claudia Ovchinnikoff ranks second in points (19) with six goals and seven feeds.

Deb Brown has been in the Owl net in every game this season, recording 239 saves to rank sixth in the nation in that category. She has also compiled a 3.13 goals against average.

UMass, meanwhile, had seen an end to sophomore forward Erica Johnston's scoring slump, as she scored game winners against St. Joe's and Yale.

Johnston was also recovering from a virus that put her out of commission for two days last week. She has collected 12 goals and three assists so far this season.

Also packing an offensive punch for the Minutewomen are Kyle Rothenberger, who has notched 11 goals and five assists this year; Saskia Fuchs, a candidate for this year's A– 10 Rookie of the Year, who has tallied seven goals while helping on 11 goals; Courtney MacLean, who had netted nine scores; and Kate Putnam, last year's Rookie of the Year, with a trio of tallies and 10 assists.

Women's soccer postseason riding on weekend

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

On the campus of this university, there are many people who possess the Kipling–esque sentiment that sport is trivial distraction, and enthusiasm for it immoral.

Not for the No. 14 Massachusetts women's soccer team (14–3–1, 7–0–1 in Atlantic 10), as there will be nothing trivial about this weekend's A–10 Championships. Tonight at 8 p.m., under the lights of the URI Soccer Complex in Kingston R.I., the A–10 Eastern Division champion Minutewomen will match up with the Colonials of George Washington (10–5–4, 6–0–2 in A–10) in a contest that will determine each team's collective postseason NCAA fates.

ATLANTIC 10 WOMEN'S SOCCER TOURNAMENT at URI Soccer Complex
Kingston, RI
— FRIDAY —
5 p.m. Dayton vs. Fordham
8 p.m. UMass vs. G. Washington
— SUNDAY —
1 p.m. Championship Game

In the first game at 5 p.m., the champions of the Western Division, Dayton, will face off against the Lady Rams of Fordham. The winners of the two games will face off Sunday afternoon for the A–10 title.

No talk about morals or ethics this weekend for coach Jim Rudy, the team has to win, period.

"Well, this becomes our biggest game of the year," Rudy said. "As I have always said, all paths to the A–10 Championship lead through GW, and this year its more true than ever, because they're having their best year since they've been in the A–10."

UMass will have to come out undistracted by NCAA Tournament bids, and with enthusiasm, as against typical A– 10 competitive matchups, GW is no pushover. Earlier this season, the Colonials were the team that broke then–No. 10 UMass' nine–game winning streak in Philadelphia, tying 2–2.

It was a tough opponent for UMass, as in the La Salle game prior the team lost the services of senior midfielder Rebecca Myers due to a torn ACL suffered in the first minute. In this game, by the half the Minutewomen had lost senior defender Erin Lynch (12 assists) to a flying head butt from a GW player, and Julie Magid (1g, 3a, 5pts) was knocked out of the game due to a tough slide tackle.

Three central people to the UMass squad were out of game, and in Rudy's words, an "off day" by the officials did not help, either. Freshman forward Emma Kurowski (10 goals, 6 assists, 26 points) was called on a marginal hand ball at the top of the penalty box, with the penalty kick pushing the momentum in GW's favor. The season for UMass turned on that call, as the Minutewomen were on to win only one game in the next four. Both Rudy and assistant coach Chris Chamides want a fresh start.

"I personally as a coach want that game back," Rudy said. "The last time we played them we suffered through some tough things. So, I'd like nothing more than to get another crack at them, beat them, win the A–10's, and then get another crack against Dartmouth [in the NCAA's], which was another game we didn't particularly show up for."

Chamides resounded those sentiments.

"Obviously, they are a team that we always have trouble with, and they are always competitive," Chamides said. "We tied them this year, so it's going to be a tough game for us."

The season also turned for GW on that call, as the Colonials rode that 2–2 tie with UMass to go on to beat

UMass hockey set to host UNH

Minutemen looking for a home sweep tonight and tomorrow

By Leigh Torbin
Collegian Staff

After playing a home–and–home set with Boston University last weekend, there will be no relief for the Massachusetts hockey team (1–3), as New Hampshire (3–2) rolls into the William D. Mullins Center for a pair of games, tonight and tomorrow, both at 7 p.m.

The Wildcats, who just recently slipped out of the national rankings, always pose both a threat for the Minutemen — and a treat for their fans — with their wide–open style of play.

UNH routinely lights up scoreboards, led by a potent threesome in Mark Mowers, Eric Boguniecki and Eric Nickulas. UNH tallied 16 goals in a home–and–home with Northeastern last weekend. Senior Tom Nolan already has 11 points in UNH's five games this year, including two goals and three assists against the Huskies on Saturday night.

Unlike most UMass opponents though, the ice surface at Mullins is of no consequence, UNH being the only other eastern team to play on a larger, Olympic–sized sheet.

While the teams will have no question on how to play each other on the ice surface, UNH will have to wonder what to expect out of UMass in net.

Rich Moriarty was superb in relief of usual starter Brian Regan last Friday night at BU, and again starting against the Terriers last Saturday. Mallen had not named a starter prior to yesterday's practice, and based on recent performances either has a legitimate shot of starting this evening.

"I'm still up in the air," Mallen said before taking to the practice ice yesterday. "Rich Moriarty gave us a reliable performance last weekend."

As for preparing the rest of his team, Mallen hopes to concentrate not as much on shutting down some high–flying forwards as exposing weaknesses in the UNH defense, where five out of six skaters are underclassmen.

"They're younger on defense," Mallen said. "There's lots of freshmen and sophomores playing there

Football faces test against W&M

By Luke Meredith
Collegian Staff

With the possibility of a 17th Yankee Conference title and an NCAA playoff appearance now mathematically out of reach, the Massachusetts football team heads into Saturday's tilt at William and Mary (7–2, 5–1 YanCon) with something to prove, and head coach Mike Hodges, while philosophical about the Minutemen's plight, is not looking to play out the string.

"Someone once said 'The only thing left to play for is pride,' and for a UMass football player, that's a lot," Hodges said. "They're upset, but this is a great group of men. We're a family."

The Tribe comes into the game in first place in the Yankee Conference, and is ranked No. 15 in the nation in the latest Division I–AA poll. The team is coming off its biggest win of the year, beating then No.6 Delaware 10–7 in overtime at home last Saturday. William and Mary is 4–0 at home this year, including wins over YanCon foes New Hampshire and Northeastern, and has won 22 of its last 24 home games.

"They're a great football team," Hodges said. "They play great defense, and they play hard. Offensively, they're what everyone would like to be, balanced. We're going to have to play our best game of the season just to have a chance to win."

UMass comes into Saturday's contest in Williamsburg on the heels of a two–game losing streak, having dropped a 40– 7 decision at the hands of UNH, and a tough 22–14 loss to Maine at Warren P. McGuirk a week ago. Last week's loss to the Black Bears officially eliminated the Minutemen from the post–season picture, and ensured that this year's senior class will end its career next Saturday at home against Connecticut.

"When you've been through the hard work that these seniors have been through, it's a very emotional thing," said Hodges of the seniors. You never think it's over, you always think that they're is always next week, or that there's always next year. But they are winners, and that's the way they want to go out."

Last season UMass recorded is biggest win of the year against William and Mary, 21–7, on homecoming weekend in Amherst. Justin Reimer had 18 tackles and forced three fumbles and Frank Alessio had 88 yards rushing and a touchdown, spoiling the Tribe's bid for a YanCon title. William and Mary ended up 7–4 in 1995.

The Tribe has been doing it all season with defense. W&M lead the Yankee Conference in total defense (243 yards per game) and rushing defense (84 yards a game). Senior free safety Darren Sharper is tied for the conference lead in interceptions with six, and has amassed 87 tackles this fall.

For the Minutemen, running the football is, despite Hodges plea to balance the offense, still the key to success. UMass leads the Yankee Conference in rushing for the second straight year, with 1,965 yards on the ground. UMass has five players with over 200 yards rushing, led by senior fullback Ron Brockington's 609 yards and four touchdowns. Senior tailback Frank Alessio has been hobbled by various injuries all season, limiting the 1995 YanCon rushing leader to just 396 yards this season.

Hodges will stick with freshman Jeff Smith at quarterback against the Tribe. Smith, who has been the starting QB since the Rhode Island game on Oct. 5, was pulled at halftime for junior Anthony Catterton.

"We needed a jumpstart," Hodges said. "And we felt

Crucial matches await volleyball over weekend

By Steven Grant
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts Minutewomen have seven Atlantic–10 matches reamaining in the volleyball regular season, and all of them are crucial to their post–season hopes.

Tonight and tomorrow mark the first three of those matches, with UMass hosting Fordham tonight at 7 p.m., La Salle tomorrow at 2 p.m. and arch–rival Temple tomorrow night at 7 p.m., all at Curry Hicks Cage.

Currently, coach Bonnie Kenny are her crew are in fourth place in the A–10, a conference in which the top four teams qualify for the post–sesason tournament. Temple is in third place, and has beaten UMass once this year in a come–from– behind victory.

Sophomore Katie Pearce, the team's setter and hence the director of its offease, realizes her team can't just worry about Temple this weekend.

"We've got to worry about Fordham, first," she said. "Our whole conference is good. This year everyone has a shot at making the post–season, with the exception of Fordham and La Salle, who are just out to knock people off."

People like the Minutewomen.

Fordham (1–13 A–10) took the Minutewomen to four games in their last match at Fordham Oct. 5. Cindy Vojtech is its leading scorer, with 2.494 kills per game. Marzena Proban leads the Lady Rams in digs with 3.539 per game. Lisa Bevill, with 2.111 digs per game, is second on the team in that category.

The last–place Lady Rams, coached by Jason Klotkowski, have only one conference win — against La Salle in a 3–0 sweep. On the rare occasion when the Explorers make it to game five, they are 2–1.

As for La Salle (2–23, 1–13 A–10), freshman middle blocker Melissa Hodge leads the Explorers with two kills per game to go along with her 1.1 digs. Autumn Krauss' two digs per game is tops on the squad.

Cruz becomes first recruit in Bruiser era

Rafael Cruz became the first recruit of the Bruiser–era in Massachusetts men's basketball history early this week, as he announced his intention to play at UMass next year.

Cruz, originally from Puerto Rico, has played in Wheeling, W.V. for the past two years, and he lists current UMass players Edgar Padilla and Carmelo Travieso as his friends.

Standing 6–foot–2, Cruz has spent much of his on–court time in the two–guard position, but is learning to run the point this year, to assimilate to the position he intends to play as a Minuteman.

Last year, Cruz averaged 24 points and six assists per game.

In other hoop news, the likely candidate for this year's Mr. Basketball in Michigan, Shane Battier, has announced that he will play his college years in a blue and white Duke uniform.

Battier, who is 6–foot–8, averaged 21.5 ppg, 13.6 rpg and 6.1 blocks last year. He also recorded a 3.9 GPA.

Ryan Hogan officially announced his intention to play for defending national champion Kentucky next year.

Easterns next on polo slate

By Fred Hurlbrink, Jr.
Collegian Staff

It's not so lonely at the top anymore.

The Massachusetts men's water polo team is the three–time defending Eastern Champions, but to win again it has to overcome maybe the most treacherous path it has faced in four years.

Six of the eight teams in the Eastern Championship field are ranked in the Water Polo Coaches Association Top 20, and the other two are in the Also Receiving Votes category.

"Top to bottom this is the most even Eastern Championship I've seen in years," UMass coach Russ Yarworth said.

The No. 16 Minutemen come into the tournament with the third seed after falling to No. 15 Queens College in the North Division playoffs. UMass (19–7) will swim off against a Slippery Rock College squad that finds itself ranked 18th nationally.

Slippery Rock has pushed its way into the top 20 by virtue of a strong scoring punch and the luxury of having one of the top goaltenders in the region.

"I'm not looking past the first round; they have a good team," Yarwoth said. "You have to win three games to get to [the NCAA tournament]."

Queens, the top seed, will face Villanova in the first round, while No. 20 Princeton face 19th–ranked Brown. No. 12 Navy — the second seed by virtue of winning the South division playoffs — will be tested by North division rival St. Francis in the first round.

Again this year, if UMass is to get by the first round, it will likely face the unenviable task of running up against the Midshipmen in the semi–finals. The Minutemen hold a deplorable all–time record against Navy (3–9), but all UMass' victories have come in the post–season, specifically, the last three Eastern Championship tournaments.

So, what does this young, immature team have to do to overcome the odds and repeat as Eastern Champions?

Yarworth, as usual, has the answer.

"They have to play hard and be committed to defense; they have to hold their cool. It's going to have to be a total team effort.

"They're talented enough to win the championship," he continued. "They have to make sure they show up with the right attitude and desire. These guys know what they have to

N. Korea uninterested in peace talks

SEOUL, South Korea (AP) — Angered by a U.S. demand that it apologize for its recent submarine mission to South Korea, North Korea threatened yesterday to stay out of proposed four–way talks on bringing peace to divided Korea.

In April, President Clinton and South Korean President Kim Young–sam proposed talks in which the two Koreas would discuss officially ending their 1950–53 Korean War with a peace treaty. Washington and Beijing would sit in as mediators.

North Korea held back, demanding a detailed explanation by the U.S. government. Washington has been negotiating with Pyongyang on allowing South Korea to join in the briefing.

But the negotiations hit a snag when the North Korean submarine was found grounded off South Korea's east coast, straining already tense relations.

U.S. officials, including Ambassador James T. Laney, have said there would be no further peace overtures, including the planned briefing, until North Korea apologizes for the sub's incursion. North Korea is "compelled to interpret this as a revocation of the four–way talks," a North Korean Foreign Ministry spokesman told Pyongyang's official Korean Central News Agency.

Dole shares jokes with Letterman

WASHINGTON (AP) — If Bob Dole is angry or bitter that he lost the election, he didn't let David Letterman know it.

His well–known dry wit in prime form, Dole scored laugh after laugh Friday as he made Letterman's "Late Show" his first public appearance since his concession speech Tuesday night.

He opened with a question for President Clinton: "How about two out of three?"

Dole was greeted with a standing ovation as he walked on stage. "The crowd goes wild," he observed.

And it did time and again as he good–naturedly poked fun at himself.

"Bob, what have you been doing lately?" Letterman asked. "Apparently not enough," Dole deadpanned.

As he left Washington's Warner Theatre, where the TV show was taped, Dole said it felt good to let down his guard. "It's all been pent up here, now, for 18 months," he told The Associated Press. "I can be myself again."

ABC "Nightline" host Ted Koppel, another guest, suggested that Dole would have been smarter to show his humor more. "If Bob Dole had only showed that side of himself a little more often," he said, trailing off as the audience applauded its agreement. "It showed another side of him — a side of him I hadn't seen," agreed Aileen McCombs, of Hampton, Va. "He should have done that during the election."

Veterans: "Do Ask, Do Tell"; Stonewall honors gay military

KENNETH W.P. SCOTT/COLLEGIAN

Veterans Dudley Towne, Karen Skolfield and Bill Hickman spoke at a panel last night about Gay Veterans.

By Jamie Sinsheimer
Collegian Staff

Last night the University of Massachusetts Stonewall Center sponsored a panel discussion to salute gay veterans in support of the national holiday. The event was an opportunity for gay veterans to share their experiences about their time in the service.

The event acknowledged and honored gay veterans both for their courage in their national service and for their courage in the face of codified, and for the most part violent, homophobia found in the U.S. Military. The event included a panel of speakers, video clips and a short question and answer period.

To begin the night, Martha Nelson, of the Stonewall Center, shared video clips including pieces from a rally in Washington D.C. in which many performers ranging from drag queen RuPaul to singer Melissa Etheridge.

Another part of the video was a sequence from C–Span in which Keith Meinhold, a gay rights activist, was speaking on the "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" policy developed by President Bill Clinton in 1993. The policy, while not condemning homosexuality, in a sense put members of the GLBT's sexual orientation on the back burner, forcing many of them to remain in the closet during the time in which they served.

After a brief intermission following the video clips, three veterans Airman First Class Bill Hickman of the U.S. Air Force; Sergeant photojournalist Karen Skolfield of the U.S. Army; and Dudley Towne a U.S. Military veteran of World War II, took the stage. Each veteran spoke of his or her personal experience in the service and shared their personal stories with the audience.

Hickman, who works at The Stonewall Center shared his story first. Born and raised in a military family he felt it his duty to serve in the Army. Ten years after coming out of the closet, he enlisted at the age of 27. He found it hard to be forced back into the closet during his time in the military. Hickman was eventually discharged for coming out.

Obviously upset, he stated that he was "here tonight to praise everyone who is in the military, because the U.S. government does not."

He also felt "Clinton did not make good on his [pro–gay] campaign promises" Hickman felt as though his life in the military was a facade because of the gay–straight aspect of it. "Gays and lesbians are being shuffled in and out of the closet on a constant basis."

Following Hickman's emotional talk was World War II veteran Dudley Towne. Wearing a pink triangle on his uniform, Towne's speech was very different then Hickman's. He mainly focused on his sexual innocence at the time of enlistment but his story also discussed how it felt to be gay before men like Leonard Matlovich brought the issue of homosexuality into the armed forces.

According to Towne, Matlovich was "the father of us all, and the first man to tell his commanding officer that he was gay."

The last speaker was Karen Skolfield who served in the Army for seven years. Never fully coming out in the military or at home Skolfield treasured the time she spent in the services. Saying that her time felt like "a bit of a tap dancing routine,' due to never fáfly being in or out of the closet at any given time.

"I was a good solider, really dedicated to my country, they lost out when I left and unfortunately they are still losing out on potentially great people," she said.

Though the crowd was small but inviting, members of the crowd felt that it wasn't enough. One gay veteran was outraged that there was minimal support from other veterans.

Conference organizes Men of Color at UM

By Humphrey brown III & Gregory Casimir
Collegian Staff

On Friday, Nov. 8, the first annual Men of Color Conference began at the School of Management.

This conference marks the first time men of color from various fraternities, organizations and RSOs have collaborated on an agenda to address the problems of retention and graduation of men of African descent at University of Massachusetts.

The first leg of the conference took place at the School of Management with an in–depth look at the history and origin of African men and women presented by Ashra Kwesi out of Dallas.

From there, the conference continued at the Bluewall in the Campus Center for dinner and networking. Before dining, Minister Yusuf Muhammad, from Springfield Mosque 13, gave a rallying speech to set the tone for the Conference.

"You're supposed to represent the best of our people," said Muhammad. "Regardless of the opposition, regardless of the odds, you can make it here, but you've got to have the right mindset."

The following morning, the first day of workshops began. After breakfast, registration for the conference was conducted by the sisters of Zeta Phi Beta Sorority, Inc.

Professor John Bracey, along with Nelson Acosta, gave a lecture entitled "Who's the Man?" The focus of the lecture centered around men of color gaining a perception of what being a real man is (i.e. respecting women, abstaining from the use of drugs and taking care of academic responsibilities).

The theme of the conference was synonymous with that of the Million Man March from a year ago — change starts with self–empowerment.

"As black men, under the similar theme of the Million Man March, if we empower ourselves first," said Kola Olosunde, a senior and biology major, "then we can go back to our community and say this is exactly what we've learned, this is how we plan to better ourselves.

"And after our community is set, then we can move into a larger campus type community. Once we've exuded or demanded the respect that we've acquired from a conference like this, then we can go the greater community and so on and so on and so on," Olosunde said.

Even though the conference was for men only, a Women's Perspective workshop was also held.

Barbera Love, from the School of Education, spoke to the men about two goals that they should strive to achieve.

"While you're here, I suggest to you to have two goals; to achieve a liberatory consciousness and to disrupt internalized oppression." stated Love.

Love also touched on vision and the kind of vision people of color should have for the 21st Century.

"Your vision will recreate the world," Love said. "We need to develop and create a language to help achieve the vision black people have for the 21st Century."

Speaking alongside Love was Lisa Scott–Crump of the Everywoman's Center.

Scott–Crump spoke about the kinds of relationships that men of color ought to engage in with women on this campus.

She mentioned that both men and women have a responsibility to learn to respect and appreciate one another.

The second and final day of the C\conference consisted of workshops dealing with Financial Aid, career mapping and professional development.

During the professional development workshop, Donald St. Mary, head of the Department of Mathematics and Statistics, stressed the importance of receiving an education in order to become a better leader.

"You getting an education will give you status and stature. And you getting status and stature will enable you to become a leader in the community," St. Mary said.

Later that night, a dinner was held on the 10th floor of the Campus Center to wrap up the conference.

Former Black Panther and dynamic leadership speaker, Charles Barron spoke in front of

Kato talks on domestic violence

By Vira Douangmany & Christine Soh
Collegian Correspondents

Yoko Kato lectured to a group of about 20 at the United Asia Cultural Center (UACC) culminating a week–long series of lectures on domestic violence , co–sponsored by the EveryWoman's Center and the Cultural Centers.

Having lost a daughter and grandson to domestic violence, Kato used her story as a means of educating an audience comprising of mostly Asian and Asian–American women on the affect of domestic violence on the Asian community.

Kato's youngest daughter, Sherry Morton, was 23 and her grandson, Cedric, was only 18 months old when they were murdered on Jan. 11, 1993, by her daughter's ex–boyfriend, John Seabrook. Seabrook had a history of abuse and prior arrests; Morton held numerous restraining orders against him.

In recounting the incident, Kato spoke on how Seabrook shoved her daughter out of a moving car and, in another incident, threatened to hit her with a table lamp.

Ten days before he was to go to court for assaulting his sister, Seabrook went to Morton's apartment in Northampton to argue about child support. He ended up stabbing her 57 times, leaving the knife in her face, but only after he forced her to watch her son Cedric die of 13 stab wounds that splintered the hardwood floor underneath him.

Seabrook is now serving two consecutive life terms in the Massachusetts Correctional Institution at Walpole.

"Cedric was part European, Japanese and African. He could have contributed to much to race relations," Kato said.

Kato spoke on how Cedric brought joy and happiness to herself and her other daughter. They were the only family she had in America.

Kato said that 95 percent of domestic violence victims are women who encompass all religious and socioeconomic groups.

"One out of every two women will be a victim of abuse, either physical or psychological, and over 65 percent of emergency phone calls are domestic violence related," said Kato.

Kato posed the question, "Why do they [women] stay?" She said that in Japanese society, the woman is blamed when a couple divorces. She also cites economic reasons for why women stay. Women experience a 73 percent drop in their standard of living while men enjoy a 42 percent increase. Three out of five women who are employed earn less than $10,000 a year.

Kato also mentioned the criminal justice system and how the problem lies in the police, judges and probation officers who view domestic violence as a private family manner. Women receive little protection despite taking out restraining orders. Abused women "will often drop charges because [the abuser] will threaten to kill her or harm her children," said Kato.

Kato has appealed to political officials about the court system and how it failed to follow up on Seabrook.

Christopher focuses on Hebron deadlock in final trip

By Barry Schweid
Associated Press

CAIRO, Egypt — On his final Middle East trip, Secretary of State Warren Christopher is undertaking a long–shot effort to break a deadlock between Israel and Palestinians over the future of the West Bank town of Hebron.

Here mostly for a Mideast economic conference, designed to promote peace through investment and development, Christopher set up a Monday midnight meeting with Yasser Arafat and a follow-up session today with Israeli Foreign Minister David Levy.

His chances of success were considered minimal. Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu talked to Arafat by telephone Sunday before flying to the United States for a series of speeches, but they did not break the deadlock.

Christopher brought his senior Middle East adviser, Dennis Ross, with him and sent him in to see Arafat first. State Department spokesman Nicholas Burns told reporters, "We are still working on it, but don't expect a breakthrough."

Christopher is resigning before the start of President Clinton's second term in January, and a search for a successor is under way. The secretary of state gave the Middle East peace process his highest priority this year, but Israeli-Syrian talks are suspended and steering Israel and the Palestinian Authority to settle on Hebron so far has not succeeded.

The goal is to implement an Israeli-Palestinian agreement that Israeli troops would redeploy to the city but steer clear of the 94,000 Arab residents and confine themselves to protecting the 450 or so Jews who maintain a 4,000-year Jewish presence in the city where the patriarch Abraham buried his dead.

Law prof. to focus today on South Africa

The controversy surrounding the passage of its new constitution last May leaves the struggle for democracy in South Africa uncertain and tense.

Penelope Andrews, associate proffesor at the City University of New York Law School at Queens College, will address this very dilemma today in W-21 Machmer Hall, University of Massachusetts at 4:00 p.m.

The discussion, entitled "Democracy and Change In South Africa," will include two CUNY Law students who recently completed internships in Capetown and Johannesburg.

Andrews has worked extensively with the South African government since the African National Congress came into power after the April '94 elections.

She worked as an Advocate of the South African Supreme Court and a associate for the Legal Resources Centre in Johannesburg.

Andrews will also meet with students interested in studying progressive law at CUNY Law School.

The event is sponsored by the Social Thought and Political Economy Program.

"Civil action" lawyer recounts environmental case

By Jossph Fountain
Collegian Staff

Thompson Hall was packed with people sitting in the aisles and peering through the doors to hear attorney Jan Schlichtmann and author Jonathan Harr tell their story Thursday night.

Schlichtmann and Harr have gained significant notoriety after Schlichtmann successfully brought a lawsuit against two multinational corporations with factories in Woburn on behalf of eight families suffering from a polluted water supply. Harr is the author of the best-seller, A Civil Action, which recounts the case.

Harr, who is also a freelance writer for The New Yorker, opened by remarking on the eight years it took him to complete the book.

"In retrospect, I would have never done this book if I knew how long it would take," said Harr.

"Jan [Schlichtmann] liked to think he was in control of his destiny," said Harr, "but the people in power failed him," referring to how Schlichtmann was embroiled in this complex case involving powerful legal and industry figures.

Schlichtmann, an alumnus of the University of Massachusetts began to talk by remembering his early days studying and practicing law.

After graduating from UMass, he spent a year working for the American Civil Liberties Union. Afterwards, he continued onto law school at Cornell.

While practicing law in Boston, he gained a reputation, he said, as a reliable attorney; which is why troubled families in Woburn turned to him.

Annie Anderson, a member of one of these families approached Schlichtmann, presenting him with a case which he characterized as a "roller coaster ride for these people who were getting sick, then well and then sick again. [Anderson's] son Jimmy was a victim."

Inspired by consumer activist and '96 Green party presidential candidate Ralph Nadar, Schlichtmann took on the case.

According to Schlichtmann, he needed to first locate the alleged polluters and establish the parameters of his case. He had to prove that Jimmy Anderson and the other children in their neighborhood were becoming sick as a result of what was being dumped into the water by W.R. Grace and Beatrice Foods.

"If we could prove the poisoned wells were causing the cancer [other lawyers] said we would win the Nobel Prize," said Schlichtmann.

The families won their first suit, but Schlichtmann re- opened the case when new information surfaced that the companies had previously hidden. Without explanation, the judge, however, threw out the new arguments.

"The legal system is shrouded in secrecy, we must open the judicial system to the light of day," said Schlichtmann.

He went on to say, "For a long time I didn't want anything to do with the law. In retrospect, I would have settled it differently. It was a mistake not to settle."

Speaking on the legal system in general, he said "to do business, you must do business — you may have to forget about the truth."

Schlichtmann now resides in the Boston area practicing product liability and torts cases; he also lectures at colleges and universities around the country.

At the end of the lecture, there was an extensive question and answer session and then a book signing by both speakers. Copies of Harr's book were on sale outside of the hall offered by the University Store.

"I thought he was charismatic. I only wished he talked a little more about how he did research," said Christy Martin, a junior family and community administration major.

"His message tonight was about value talk. Its a great thing to hear from a former student. He is much more optimistic than he was at the end of the book. Its good that he came back to where he started," said John Brigham, professor in the political science department.

Brigham added, "they're always making a split between the academic and real worlds, Jan [Schlichtmann] is proof there is no sharp break between the two."

a mixed crowd of both men and women, about leadership.

"Most people take leadership lightly," began Barron. "Leadership is not a position, it's a function."

Barron also touched on racism and the responsibility of people of color to pull themselves out of the cycle of continued oppression.

"We're not responsible for getting knocked down, but we're responsible for getting back up," said Barron.

The conference ended with awards being given to prominent leaders in UMass' black community. Among the recipients were Ricardo Townes, James E. Callahan and Professor John Bracey.

Those who participated in the Conference echoed the theme of the Conference as it came to a close.

"Our survival depends on each other and our success depends on our survival," said senior Dan Lizana.

According to Kato, every time Seabrook faced the courts, different judges would tell him to seek counseling, but there would be no follow up.

"The system is wrong. Three court houses in Springfield and Holyoke had no cross communication," said Kato.

The district attorney has assured Kato that the system has changed. Now officials can punch in a social security number and any past record of their violations will appear.

"The system punishes women and lets men have their freedom. Domestic violence ought to be treated like drunk driving, you lose your license and must go through a driver's-ed course to get it back. Why couldn't domestic violence be treated the same way?" asked Kato.

Kato has established a memorial fund for young single mothers who have been victims of domestic violence and would like to pursue higher education. So far, two women have graduated and become registered nurses.

Kato closed by urging everyone to get involved. Her life story will be told on NBC's Real Life in the coming months.

Let's knock out boxing

Check this out.

In the blue corner weighing in at 200-something pounds, we have the heavyweight hero, fighting his way back to the top after having "gone away" for a couple of years. This man overcame all the odds, coming from a disadvantaged childhood and repeated setbacks to obtain the heavyweight title twice.

While he "was gone," the boxing world missed having a true champion. Now that he's back, he better be registered with his local police because he's a sex offender... a rapist to be exact, but it doesn't matter what he is. As far as the boxing world is concerned, his name can be translated literally to "cha-ching—cha-ching."

The boxing community loves him because people want to see the man fight, and will shell out 50 bucks to have his usually less-than-10-minute fights on their own little television sets. The fans love him because he has more power to hurt than any other. His popularity is evidence that something in this world has gone terribly wrong. Ladies and gentlemen... Mike "The Loveable Rapist" Tyson.

Mark McGrath

And in the other corner, a man who's been labeled a great athlete and a superior embassador for the "sport" of boxing. Thought to be past his prime and lacking of the necessary stamina for a slug fest like the one to follow, this man relies on the power of Jesus to help him mash his opponents' faces. Known to recite prayers as his opponents are peeling themselves off the canvas, he is truly up there with the Holy One. Ladies and gentlemen, Evander "The Prayin' Puncher" Holyfield.

And so it began, the fight of the year... or decade... or millennium. Whatever it was, that is how it began. The two men proceeded to beat the living pulp out of each other for 11 rounds, and then it was over. The Prayin' Puncher beat the Lovable Rapist thoroughly and took away two of his belts and a hefty sum of almost $11 million for his trouble. The loser received $30 million for being beaten up.

While the television personalities were praising the spectacle as one of the best of all time, promoters were already working up the rematch. The speed with which the organizers reacted to the unanticipated result was as stunning as Holyfield's victory, but what would you expect from a sport that has come to resemble WWF wrestling in its marketing techniques?

Anyone watching the press conference following the fight could see the major clashes before their very eyes. Mike Tyson, the Muslim, praising Allah for giving him the strength to accept defeat as well as victory. Holyfield sporting a hat that read "Jesus is Lord," or something like that, telling the attending audience how he was led by the Holy Spirit in what amounted to more of a sermon than a victory speech.

There it was, the beginning of a Holy War. Who's version of God is really stronger? Tune in a couple of months from now for the rematch. It'll only cost you $50. After that, "The Rubber Match," $50 more. If you're not careful, before you know it, you'll have spent hundreds of dollars watching the same two men beat each other up repeatedly while they embrace each other on the way to the bank.

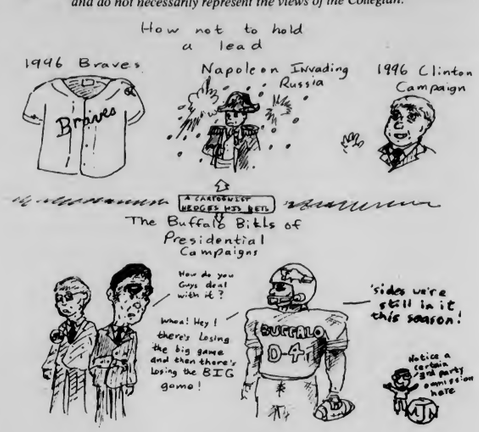
The world of boxing is such a stupid game. Observers were surprised by the Loveable Rapist's graciousness in defeat. As if he wouldn't be happy, earning almost a million dollars per fighting minute. If you must know, I'd be gracious in having my arm hacked off with a rusty spatula if it meant I'd be $30 million dollars richer for the trouble.

Why, then do we give them the pleasure?

Apparently, we human beings get some sort of thrill out of watching two men beat the hell out of each other until only one of them stands or a lengthy time has passed. In most cases, the fighters are minorities, and those who profit from their exchanges are more than happy to dehumanize them, presenting them as little more than wild animals performing solely for the white establishment's viewing pleasure. The majority of viewers apparently get their jollies out of watching the blacks, Hispanics or whoever they happen to be, beating each other up for the sake of a couple of bucks paid for by their own selfless generosity.

Racist undertones aside, boxing enthusiasts become such raving lunatics that they watch these fights over and over again, locating the key moment in time when the loser's head buckles or when he is too dazed to defend his own face. They live for the knockout blow, and according to these enthusiasts, there's nothing at all wrong with what they do.

They look at those who promote these "sporting events" with contempt. "So they're crooked," they say, "So boxing's a shady business." Nonetheless they shell out $50 to see the fight on television, knowingly filling the pockets of the man we call a crooked, shady, big-haired, wild eyed, big- mouthed moron. But we have no problem in doing so, certainly not enough to let it get in the way of a good fight.



And what makes a good fight? Is there such a thing? Last I heard, fighting was wrong, that there were hundreds of other, healthier ways of working out our problems. Does the fact that a boxing match takes place in front of millions of people make it a worthy endeavor? Boxers get away with what people on the street get arrested for, and there are millions of winnesses and video tapes to boot.

Boxing is a shady world, that cannot be denied. It's time we, as a society, take a look at the establishment, separating what can be considered sport from the heap of garbage that now exists. If (and I stress if) any redeeming qualities present themselves, then a new organization should be formed working with and accenting those virtues. If there are no redeeming qualities, as the case appears to be, boxing as a sport should be "knocked out" forever.

Beats working in the D.C.

Are you still wondering what you'd like to be when you grow up? Are you concerned about how you'll be surviving once you graduate from this sheltered campus? Let's keep it real- most of us share these concerns. Perhaps we can explore some of our options right here on campus. Here's an overview of some of the high paying jobs at UMass which could allow you to live more than comfortably.

C.F. Gorospe

After years of people networking, in other words, kissing up, maybe one of us will be fortunate to take the place of Chancellor Scott. He's currently making $150,000 each year. The Chancellor is defined as "the chief administrative officer reporting to the President of the University system. The Deputy Chancellor, three Associate Chancellors and five Vice Chancellors report to the Chancellor."

My question is, what legwork is left for Chancellor Scott when he has all these people reporting to him? Hmmm... I wonder what he's really getting paid for. Supposedly, he speaks for the campus to audiences like the trustees, state and federal legislators and alumni about state and local public affairs. How often do these meetings take place in a year anyway? Do all of you even know what he looks like? After all, he speaks for you. I also wonder how much free time he gets in a year. It's not like we're the best school in the nation.

Another option is possibly becoming the President of UMass after current President Billy Bulger is done. His position makes $141,000 per year. One of the President's primary responsibilities is to represent the campus to the governor, legislature, executive branch agencies, state agencies, federal government and other major constituences. Furthermore, he provides overall leadership to the entire University.

This job description sounds pretty glamorous. No one will ever really know if you're not working dilligently— except for those times when you have to meet with major constituences. Once you enter the position, everything is laid out for you. There's not much work to do unless you really want to improve the University. You'll have all these people reporting to you.

Again I ask, how many of you have seen or personally talked to President Bulger, who represents you in front of the federal government? What strategic plans has he laid out to lead us successfully? I haven't read or heard much about his plans. Please don't be modest about telling us your plans, Mr. Bulger. If you know of any, maybe you can inform some of us who don't know.

Those who report to the Chancellor, like an associate chancellor make $105,000 a year. The provost makes $113,000. One of the academic advisors I have makes $117,000. The vice chancellor for campus activities makes $74,000.

The assistant basketball coach makes $51,000. The manager of the University Store/retail service & general manager makes $57,000. I didn't bother looking up how much everyone else makes. You can do this on your own if you're curious enough. It is all public information and you have access to it. I'm sure that there are more positions on campus that earn 6-digit salaries. What are the responsibilities of these positions? I don't think that all these positons are overwhelmingly difficult enough for the salaries earned.

Are these people really doing what they're supposed to, especially when they have other jobs that they're working for them? It seems that the easier a position gets and the less work one has, the more money one makes. If any of you ever end up filling these positions in the future, please do what you have to do and more. Earn the money for what it's worth, don't just receive it.

Flower of Death

My mom wanted to name me Lorraine, which happens to be my middle name. My dad wanted to name me Marigold. I'm surprised that my name didn't turn out to be Lorraine Marigold though, because my mom's a pretty stubborn lady. Regardless, I like the way things worked out. I love my name.

Usually when I introduce myself, I have to say my name more than once. "What? No, really? Your name is Miracle?" I've also gotten Margo, Magnolia, Mayflower (I wouldn't even make that up), and Mamahgold (my best friend's baby cousin couldn't quite get my name, and since then, her entire family tree calls me that. That was eight years ago.)

When I was 15, my best friend got me one of the coolest Christmas gifts ever: she paid for my tattoo. On the inside of my left ankle I have two marigolds. My friends like to make fun of me by saying that they know when I've had one too many — all of a sudden out of the corner of their eye, they see my leg fly up on the barstool, or the pool table (usually the pool table,) and I'm showing new acquaintances my tattoo.

Marigold Pascual

At the end of my freshman year at UMass, a bunch of friends and I were in my room and had the television on "E.R." None of us were really paying attention because we were playing a card game. This was the episode that some hot-shot doctor comes to visit the "E.R." and runs into Carter; apparently this doctor was old friends with Carter and his family. So all this time, no one at the hospital knew that Carter's family was incredibly wealthy until this doctor blows his cover. The end part of the conversation went something like this:

"I remember you being quite fond of your pony, Carter. (turning to address Benton, Green, and Ross) Carter loooved that pony. It was this beautiful white Finnish show pony... I believe that it had an unusual name... What was that name again, Carter?"

"...Marigold. The name was Marigold."

Beautiful. Now I'm a horse. A couple of my friends were jealous that Carter's horse and I shared the same name. I see no logic in that.

That's not the only television show that my name has been in. Just recently I was watching "Sabrina." You know, the teen witch? Well, I was in the kitchen making garlic bread when I heard someone calling out my name. I go in the living room and it's one of the characters. It was Sabrina's aunt, this snobby, uppity, catty witch who gets screwed at the end of the show. I'm sad to say that I got sucked into watching that entire episode. That really bad episode.

Recently, I found out a bunch of stuff about my name. I logged into my e-mail account and my friend had written to me. The message was about two sentences long. "I learned in my Death and Immortality class today that in the Aztec culture, yellow marigolds are the flower of death. Gotta jet to class now."

Later that day I was calling ahead an order to Bueno Y Sano. After I gave my name to the guy, he was like "Marigold?" Uhm, yeah. "Marigold..." and then he snickered. Then I started stressing like mad, thinking oh no... it's that guy. (Everyone has that guy or that girl that they just dread seeing, you know what I mean?) So I pick up my food (it wasn't him) and the guy working there starts a conversation with me.

"Did you know that the government is trying to control the selling and growing of marigolds?"

"Because they're hallucinogens?"

"Well, apparently some company is trying to put a patent on marigolds due to their medicinal value. So we won't be able to just grow them. Pretty bogus, huh?"

Driving home, I realized that I just knew far too much about marigolds.

After I finish eating most of my tasty burrito, the phone rings. It's one of my best friends. I tell her about my acquisition of marigold knowledge when she informs me that she has a book about flowers. She gets it out and turns to the page I'm on, "Marigold: Grief."

According to this book, The Language of Flowers, the marigold has always been associated with the sun's journey across the sky, from nine in the morning until three in the afternoon. Victorians believed they could set the clock by the hour the marigold opened and closed its petals. It gets better. "The name Marigold probably means Mary-gold after the Virgin Mary." (That part made us smile.) Also, apparently children have been reminded of a button when looking at marigolds and have dubbed them Bachelor's Buttons. And lastly, "the Marigold signifies grief because the flower daily mourns the departure of the sun when it's petals are forced to close."

It was pretty neat to find out all that stuff about marigolds. For a while I even changed my personal user name to "Flower of Death." Wow. I'm glad my first name isn't Lorraine, because then I wouldn't have anything to write about. But hey, my confirmation name is Valentine, which is a whole other column altogether.

Dumb, Dumber, Dumbest

In the latest version of Romeo and Juliet, the audience would be better served if the two lovers had killed themselves in the opening scene.

Instead, we are dragged along on a glitz and glamour Hollywood sled ride from hell, that is confusing at best.

I would almost rather eat a box of used Q-tips than sit through another showing of this film.

There are several reasons why I hated this twisted version of the Bard's work.

Shakespeare's plays were designed entirely for an audience that was familiar with not only the language, but many of the jokes and puns which are an integral part of the performance. According to everything I have ever heard or seen, his plays also had practically no scenery stage props. Because of this, the audience was forced to rely on listening to the lines and observing body language.

There is almost no emphasis on the words.

Instead we are presented with a vast array of flashy scenery and cheeseball puns. The editing techniques look like a sketchy cross between an MTV commercial (which people connected with the film said they were going for) and a bad trip. I wonder which requires more drug use, editing this movie, or watching it.

If this film doesn't insult your intelligence, then nothing will.

To a large extent, this reflects an alarming trend in American television and movies. It has become blatantly obvious that whomever is producing this mental feces feels that the American public is about as smart as an Orangutan whose head has been kicked in by a Mule.

MTV, a.k.a the Jenny McCarthy Channel, which I mentioned previously, is one of the most obvious guilty parties. Why the hell do they have their camera people film at those bizarre angles ? Do they think that viewers under the age of 35 have some sort of bizarre vision problem that makes us see the world in a skewed manner? Everything on MTV also has to happen very quickly. Since young people are stupid, we have no attention spans, therefore everything must be presented at a rate slightly faster than a strobe light in order for our young, still forming brains to understand.

Whoever came up with half of those shows should be kicked off the planet and forced to live on Mars where they will be required to read one book per year. This will keep them occupied for decades.

"We should be the ones to define ourselves, not a bunch of burnt–out, pot– smoking, ex– hippie baby–boomers with nothing better to do than bitch about people younger than themselves."

Daniel E. Levenson

Part of the problem comes from this idea of "Generation X." of the many names that have characterized a generation this is by far the dumbest. We should be the ones to define ourselves, not a bunch of burnt–out, pot–smoking, ex–hippie baby–boomers with nothing better to do than bitch about people younger than themselves. If any generation deserves the title of "Generation X," it is the people who use this repugnant terminology.

I do not have faith in anything which prefaces information or explanation by telling me, in effect, that I am stupid. I refused to be talked down to by a picture on an electronic box.

There seems to be two types of news media coverage out there. News that informs the public, and news that does not. Good news coverage attempts to educate and disseminate information, while bad news coverage does nothing but spread rumors and confuse the public.

When televised media or Hollywood provides garbage that is wholly misrepresentative and uninformative of reality or of an author's real idea, the audience loses out.

So what can we do? Do we resign ourselves to our culturally mandated vegetative roles as idiotic consumers of spoon-fed crap, or do we toss our televisions out in the trash?

The answer is simple. Neither.

Out of focus: CAMERA distorts Palestine

The historical record regarding the fate of the native American peoples is clear and unequivocal. They were forced from their land, ruthlessly colonized, subjected to massacre and genocide, robbed of their freedom and, in many cases, existence. Any group or organization suggesting that the Native Americans did not exist, were ordered to leave their lands by their own leaders, had no right to possession of the land they occupied, brought their fate upon themselves, or did not suffer a great injustice, would be universally recognized as displaying a neurotic inability to come to terms with historical reality.

Hussein Ibish

With regard to the question of Palestine, we have witnessed just such a display of denial. Most recently, the national Zionist propaganda group CAMERA (ironically named the "Committee for Accuracy in Middle East Reporting in America") has again issued a press statement denouncing articles written in the Massachusetts Daily Collegian. They claim such columns are "invariably filled with inaccuracies, half-truths and falsehoods." But the statement by CAMERA's professional hacks only demonstrates yet again that manty Zionists continue to seek refuge in pathological forms of denial.

For example, CAMERA claims that explaining that the transfer of Palestinians from Palestine was a policy advocated by almost all of the Zionist leaders in Palestine amounts to "a complete inversion of the truth." They claim that transfer was a British proposal, and that "Jewish leaders categorically rejected the idea of mandatory transfer."

This is a complete lie. In his book, The Expulsion of the Palestinians, historian Nur Masalha meticulously documents the concept of transfer in Zionst thought from the earliest days of the movement in the 1880's through the actual ethnic cleansing of the Palestinians in 1948. In his first chapter, "Zionist transfer ideas and proposals, 1882-1956," Masalha outlines the long and varied history of Zionist transfer plans, demonstrating that among the Zionist settlers, the concept and principle of expelling the Palestinians "was embraced by almost all shades of opinion from the Revisionist right to the Labor left." Israel Shahak has made the same point in one of his most celebrated "Reports."

CAMERA absurdly claims that transfer was first proposed by the British in the 1936 Peel Commission report. It should be asked why the British would be interested in the ethnic cleansing of Palestinians, and in whose benefit they would have proposed such steps. Of course, it was the Jewish Agency, in effect the Zionist settlers' government, that pushed for both transfer and partition of Palestine to the members of the Commission.

In fact, as Masalha's second chapter, "The Royal (Peel) Commission, 1937" amply demonstrates, the build up and aftermath of the Peel Commission, especially the Twentieth Zionist Congress in Zurich in 1937, provides the clearest indication of the unanimity with which the Zionists embraced the concept of transfer. The work of many other scholars, including Israel Shahak, Leni Brenner, Walid Khalidi, Benjamin Beit-Hallahmi, Noam Chomsky and many others, has demonstrated the centrality and necessity of transfer in Zionist thought. The fact that the Zionists ultimately conducted a major campaign of ethnic cleansing ("transfer") in 1948 is, of course, the ultimate demonstration their commitment to the principle of transfer.

Of course, Zionist leaders were aware of the moral qualms some others might feel in regard to policies such as mass expulsions of Palestinians. Therefore, many of them, such as David Ben-Gurion, were careful to issue self-serving public comments denouncing such notions, and disavowing and denying any such desires or activities.

On cue, CAMERA dutifully pulls forth some of these disingenuous denials to attempt to distance the Zionist leaders from one of their most basic ideas. (Readers should recall that defenders of the apartheid regime in South Africa routinely used to bring forward quotations from its leaders, most typically Foreign Minister Pik Botha, denouncing racism, discrimination, etc.) But judging them both on the basis of the historical record of Zionist ethnic cleansing, as well researched by scholars such as Simha Flapan, Benny Morris, Micheal Palumbo, Walid Khalidi, and so many others, and by their private statements, such as Ben-Gurion's diaries for example, the commitment of the Zionist leaders to the principle and practice of ethnic cleansing cannot be reasonably challenged.

As Micheal Bar-Zohar points out in his biography of Ben- Gurion, "The appeals to the Arabs to stay, Golda's mission, and other similar gestures were the result of political considerations, but they did not reflect [Ben-Gurion's] basic stand. In internal discussion, in instructions to his people, the 'old man' demonstrated a clear stand: it was better that the smallest possible number of Arabs remain within the area of the state." As Simha Flapan notes, "Moreover, in the face of the often brutal destruction and evacuation of [Palestinian] villages, Ben-Gurion — along with other cabinet ministers — publicly criticized the brutality, looting, rape and indiscriminate killing. In private, however, Ben- Gurion was not averse to making his real views clear."

For example, Yitzhak Rabin recalled that Ben-Gurion had personally instructed him and Yigal Allon to cleanse the large Palestinian towns of Lydda and Ramleh of their people. He reports that "Yigal Allon asked Ben-Gurion what was to be done with the civilian population. Ben-Gurion waved his hand in a gesture of 'drive them out.'" It should also be recalled that Ben-Gurion had gone so far as to establish the "Transfer Committee," which he referred to as the "Committee for Uprooting and Expulsion," which was to oversee activities designed to ensure that the Palestinian population in the new "Israeli" state should not exceed 20 percent. They were ruthlessly effective. At least 700,000 Palestinians were ethnically cleansed.

It is a simple fact, that should be clear to anyone with even the most rudimentary understanding of the Zionist project, that the transfer of the Palestinians was a logical and necessary outgrowth of the desire to create a Jewish state in a country of Palestinians. That transfer was a central Zionist concept is not only a simple fact, it is obvious and inevitable as well. An inability to confront this reality, as demonstrated in CAMERA's statement, is a profound demonstration of the psychological distortions that racist pathologies can produce.

The Zionist psychopathology has led many to claim, in spite of the clear evidence of ethnic cleansing, that the Palestinians left because they were somehow "ordered to" by their leadership, not because they were expelled. Not surprisingly, CAMERA repeats this bizarre assertion. But, this singularly unconvincing fabrication was exposed as an utter fraud in 1961 by Erskine Childers. Only paid hacks of a cynical propaganda organization like CAMERA would even think to repeat such a thoroughly disproven claim. Simha Flapan traced the origin of this myth to a request from Israeli Foreign Minister Moshe Sha'aret to Eliyahu Sasson for a way to explain the Palestinian exodus to the UN in 1948. In response, Sasson created the "order myth."

CAMERA's weird thinking about ethnic cleansing also leads them to the assertion that transfer is no longer an issue in Palestine because the total number of Palestinians living under Israeli rule has increased. The logic put forward by CAMERA seems to be that because Israel did not use forced sterilization and "allowed" Palestinians to have children, this somehow means Zionists don't believe in transfer.

Finally, CAMERA makes much over the supposed misrepresentation of the Patria incident, where 250 jewish refugees were killed by a bomb that the Zionist leadership placed on their ship, in a column in the Collegian shortly after the death of Yitzhak Rabin. CAMERA claimed to have discovered that the Collegian account was a "fabrication" and that the Zionists were trying to "save" the refugees, although from what is unclear (they were docked in Haifa harbor awaiting passage to safe haven in Mauritius). CAMERA describes our account as "100 percent wrong."

As usual, CAMERA is unable or unwilling to face the simple truth. The facts of the incident are not in question, only the motivation of the bombers. CAMERA maintains that somehow the bombing was motivated by a concern for the refugees and that it was an innocent action, in spite of the hundreds of dead.

One of the clearest accounts of the motivations behind the Patria bombing comes from Herzl Rosenblum, who was a member of the euphemistically named "Small Action Committee" of the Zionist leadership. He recalled that "A session of the Small Action Committee, of which I was a member, met in Jerusalem. At the table opposite me sat the commander of the Patria project, A. Golamb. Haganah spokesman in the Zionist shadow cabinet. When my turn came to speak, I rose and told the meeting openly everything I thought about this act; namely, that this was not a blow against England, but an irresponsible, aimless, mass- murder of Jews who had been saved from the European catastrophe. I added that if any of us believed that we had to fight the British by committing hara-kiri, let him commit hara-kiri, for hara-kiri is suicide and not an act of murder. I stated plainly that this road was open to Mr. Golamb, but that he could not sacrifice other Jews for his policy without first asking them, and particularly the children among them — a crime which I openly protested. At this point Mr. Golamb jumped up and attacked me with his fists. But the people next to him at the table held him back. I must add that Mr. Golamb's fists, which I will never forget, did not annoy me as much as the servility of all the committee members, none of whom supported me."

So, far from being a "fabrication," our account of the motivations behind the Patria bombing is again confirmed.

On the 18th anniversary of the bombing, Moshe Sha'aret and David Ben-Gurion declared that the Patria bombing victims were "martyrs" to the Zionist cause, and sought to justify their actions by claiming that "It is sometimes necessary to sacrifice a few in order to save many."

If they believe what they write, CAMERA clearly suffers from a deep and pathological denial and inability to cope with uncomfortable historical realities. Of course, given that they are professional propagandists with a national Zionist organization, there may be as much cynicism as neurosis in their distortions.

But, the fact that there is an audience for their bizarre and insupportable account of recent Middle Eastern indicates that the racist psychopathology associated with Zionism remains a common affliction among supporters of Israel.

The truth about the Patria

Recently there have been a number of articles and letters in the Collegian purporting to present the "facts" regarding the origins, and aims of the Zionist colonial project in Palestine and the actions of Israel.

Joining in the fray locally have been large, well funded national Zionist organizations including the Anti Defamation League (ADL), the Israeli Consulate and the Committee for Accuracy in Middle East Reporting in America (CAMERA).

The main function of these Zionist organizations is the propagation of a mythology surrounding the Israeli presence in Palestine. Any serious attempt to scrutinize, analyze and criticize Israeli actions is systematically countered by groups such as these with misinformation and lies.

A typical example is CAMERA's repeated attempt to "set the record straight" regarding the 1940 bombing of the steamer Patria by the Jewish Agency. Enraged by the dissemination of the truth, CAMERA has resorted to bizarre rationalizations to excuse murder.

The steamer Patria, contained hundreds of Jewish refugees who were fleeing a war torn, Nazi dominated Europe, and in effect saved from the Holocaust. The Patria — which was about to head for safe haven in Mauritius — was docked in the Haifa harbor in Palestine. The Zionists were, of course, hoping to populate Palestine with European refugees fleeing on the Patria and other ships.

Sunanda Ghosh & Shyamala Ivatury

In 1940, Palestine was under British colonial rule, a League of Nations "mandate." Consequently, it was up to the British to allow the refugees to disembark and immigrate. Responding to the mounting Arab resistance to the Zionists colonization of Palestine, the British refused to allow the refugees to leave the ships. They offered the island of Mauritius as a haven until the end of the war.

Cynically playing with the lives of the refugees, the Zionist paramilitary group, the Haganah, the armed wing of the Jewish Agency, planted a bomb on the Patria. The motivation appears to have involved a demonstration by the Zionists to the British that if the Jewish refugees were not to be allowed to colonize Palestine, then they were prepared to die. Of course, the refugees on the Patria were not consulted by the Haganah when the bomb was placed on the ship. The bomb exploded and over 250 Jewish refugees from Europe lost their lives.

In the March 8, 1996 issue of the Collegian, CAMERA spokesperson Andrea Levin characterized this event as "a valiant rescue attempt at a time of frighful danger." How the inhuman murder of over 250 Jewish refugees by the Zionists can be considered a valiant rescue attempt is beyond rational human comprehension. Furthermore, it ignores the clear legal and moral responsibility of the Zionists for these murders.

Ms. Levin disingenuously claims that the bombing was a "desperate and heroic effort to prevent thousands of Jews confined in ships from being turned away from safe haven" implying that the refugees would otherwise have been returned to Nazi-occupied Europe or set adrift on the high seas. Ms. Levin and CAMERA know full well that that destination of the Patria and his passengers was to safe haven in Mauritius.

Ms. Levin and CAMERA wilfully ignore the fact that in the course of placing bombs in a ship filled up with people one can hardly avoid risking their lives. It is clear that Zionists were attempting to use the Jewish refugees as pawns to further their colonial ambitions in Palestine. It reflects the contempt felt by many in the Zionist movement at the time for Jews not actively engaged in the colonial project in Palestine, and a sense that if these people could not live in Palestine, then they should not live at all.

It also indicates that the Zionist movement, while purporting to be a movement to safeguard world Jewry, has often demonstrated little concern for lives and safety of Jewish people. Rather, its primary concern has always been with the establishment of their Zionist state in Palestine. Indeed, the bombing of the Patria is explained by the fact that the resettlement in Mauritius did not suit the Zionist aim of colonizing Palestine with European Jews. Both the Haganah bombers and CAMERA seem to have concluded that the Patria refugees were somehow benefited by being bombed.

Ms. Levin further claims that the Haganah bombers were merely trying to "force a delay" and miscalculated. CAMERA's excuses are preposterous. Who would believe it if Timothy McVeigh were to argue that, in placing the bomb in the Alfred P. Murray Federal Building in Oklahoma City he intended merely to force an evacuation of the building, miscalculated, and ended up killing hundreds of people?

The whole flap over the account of the Patria bombing and CAMERA's supposed "clarification" of this alleged "fabrication" is typical of the discourse of these large, national Zionist propaganda groups. These people have absolutely no commiment whatsoever to the truth, and have shown themselves willing to resort to blatant lies, distortions, and misinformation as a matter of course.

These propaganda groups enter the debate in our University with the aim of hoodwinking students, by invoking their pompous and official-sounding names. They especially have an eye to propagandizing Jewish students, and ensuring that they do not begin to see alternative perspectives on the question of Palestine. Their aim is to make certain that support for racism and colonialism remains firm using any disreputable methods possible.

Cyclone death toll continues to rise

HYDERABAD (The Indian Express) — The situation in coastal Andhra Pradesh, ravaged by an unprecedented cyclonic storm, continued to be grim as heaps of bodies were recovered from hamlets close to the sea shore in East Godavari district and several fishermen were still reported missing.

The death toll in the hurricane havoc was officially put at 650 though unofficial sources claimed that it may be around 2,500 with at least one thousand fishermen from villages embanking the coastline near Amalapuram in East Godavari district were still untraceable.

An official of the relief department said here, "unless enumeration work is completed, we cannot give exact figures. The situation is very grim." Amidst reports of colossal human tragedy in the coastal belt apart from unprecedented crop and property damages, Prime Minister H.D. Deve Gowda undertook an aerial survey of the worst-hit areas in East and West Godavari districts.

The serene paddy-rich landscape presented a macabre picture as several bodies, mostly of fishermen, were washed ashore in villages surrounding Amalapuram. A vigorous search by the Coast Guards to trace the missing fishermen continued.

A cluster of fishermen-dominated villages Balusuthippa, Kothapalem, Neellarevu, Chirrayanam, Kaatrenikonda and Gannavaram were totally wiped out in the swirling waters, reports said. An official spokesman here said "despite heavy odds, an intensive search is being carried out by the eastern naval command to trace the missing fishermen."

Visibly moved by the spectre of large-scale deaths and destruction in the Konaseema region, Gowda, who made an aerial visit of the cyclone-affected areas, described the situation as 'national calamity'. He felt that there was an immediate need to mobilize resources for taking up rescue and relief mperations.

Go Sailor set sail at Hampshire

Go Sailor takes their bubblegum pop to Hampshire College tonight at the Prescott Tavern at 8:30 p.m.

Rolling Stone has never been the prime source of underground music news, but occasionally they buy themselves a clue and talk about acts besides Joan Osbourne and Sheryl Crow.

Although Crow may be gracing the latest cover, the rest of the issue is hardly a waste. Under a heading "Generation Next 1996: The Best of Modern Rock," Rolling Stone gives respectable coverage to such acts as Sleater-Kinney, Bis, Cub, Cat Power, Long Fin Killie and Yasura.

The most surprising entry must be Bis, a fine young Glasgow act. By stealing the cuteness of the cuddle-core movement and adding the punk angst of Huggy Bear the teenage trio has discovered a new hybrid of rock dubbed "disco punk." So far the band has only released one song in the States (on a split seven-inch single with Heavenly) but have four singles available in Europe. The band is in negotiations with Grand Royal, is a BISIie Boys collaboration in the near future?

But as always Rolling Stone makes a few blatant mistakes in judgment. By naming the Phish wanna-be band Moe. as "on the edge" is an insult to innovative musicians everywhere. Their current single "Meat" is 44 minutes long, give me a break.

• Bid a good-bye to Velocity Girl, the Washington D.C. band who never quite lived up its expectations. Their second single "My Forgotten Favorite" remains one of the best songs of the post-Loveless era. Unfortunately, since then the band lost its edge and found themselves competing with Letters to Cleo for fans. Their last show at Pearl Street a year ago marks the only time I have ever fallen asleep standing up.

• Speaking of the D.C. pop scene, two of the area's finest acts, Poole and Racecar, are set to play Greenough Basement this Saturday night with the Push Kings, an excellent Boston band and the Mitchells.

Concertgoers at the Loud Music Festival may remember the Push Kings superb set, easily one of the highlights of the weekend.

To keep their fans satisfied the band has kept busy with a slew of new releases including a full length record and an appearance on the Puppet Glove zine compilation seven-inch single alongside Tully Craft, Pest 5000 and Tizzy.

Mike Burke

• Besides the Push Kings show, several quality gigs are planned in the upcoming weeks. In the pop show of the semester, Go Sailor plays Hampshire College's Prescott Tavern. Formed from the ashes of pop-punk prototype's Tiger Trap, Go Sailor continues in their footsteps towards pop paradise. Led by Rose Melberg, who also moonlights as a member of the Softies, Go Sailor captures up all the fun and energy of Tiger Trap. This is one show not to be missed. On Nov. 20 Go Sailor returns to the area for a special show in Hartford with My Favorite, Musical Chairs and Tizzy.

In other show news, Thurston Moore of Sonic Youth plays the Unitarian Church in Amherst without Rashied Ali who was previously billed. Ali has tendinitis. Vitapup and Pen Pal perform at Smith College on Nov. 17. And finally New York's lovable pop boys Holiday return to UMass on Nov. 23.

• Keep your fingers crossed that Amherst College rediscovers their excellent taste in music which has been lost as of late. Do we really need the God Rays to play the Valley three times in six months? Aren't there any better bands that the school could waste their students' $30,000 tuition on? What about the Magnetic Fields?

• For a more uplifting story, check out the latest addition to the Montague Book Mill. Known for their extensive used book selection, the Mill now houses an excellent used record store run by Byron Coley, underground rock renaissance man. Since opening last month, Coley has sold off portions of his 12,000 plus record collection. With a selection ranging from free jazz to oldies to noise, reasonable prices and Coley's handy advice, this record store can't be beat. Try finding a mint copy of a Pussy Galore or Sun Ra record anywhere else in the Valley.

• In other record store news, Main Street Records looks to be closing up shop in the near future. Is this Media Play and Newbury Comics' second victim in the Valley?

Dozin' new Dead discs

Three CD set capture Dead live in '90

By Joshua Boyd
Collegian Staff

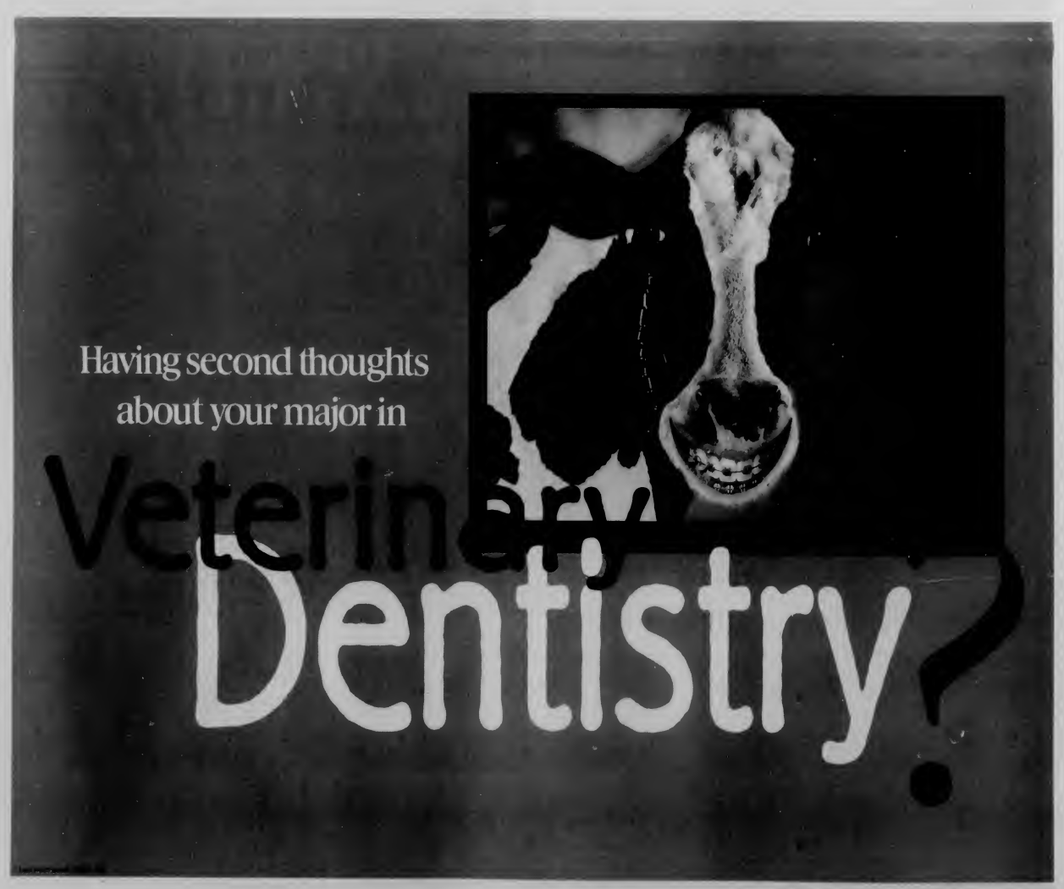
GRATEFUL DEAD
Dozin' At The Knick
Grateful Dead Records

The Arista Years
Arista Records

The Dead may have hung up their union and sound, and the surviving members have gone on to newer musical and non-musical fields but the Grateful Dead's vaults are ready to please those deadicated fans with plenty of archival concert footage. Dozin' At The Knick, culled from a three night run (March 24–26, 1990) at the Knickerbocker Arena in Albany, NY is one of the first of these posthumous releases that is not in the heralded Dick's Picks series.

This three disc set is put together in a somewhat confusing way: Disc one has many good collector's items — rarely played live songs from the three nights. Disc two and the first half of Disc three are the full second set from March 25. The rest of Disc three is the second half of the second set from the third night. Got to hand it to the tape editors.

On the first disc, the opener, "Hell In A Bucket," is done true to the 1987 In The Dark album version as is the synth- polluted, Southern California cocaine-fueled "Just A Little Light," written by keyboardist Brent Mydland (a cocaine casualty himself later in 1990) and band lyricist Robert Hunter, and sung by Mydland. Mydland's writing falters both on "Little Light," and the oddly Richard Marx-sounding "I Will Take You Home," but is redeemed by his fully composed blues, the never-before-released, "Never Trust A Woman." His singing is airy and well-crafted.



"Dupree's Diamond Blues", a 1969's live rarity, makes an appearance also on the first disc, but it's masterpiece is an intense arrangement of Robert Johnson's delta blues classic, "Walkin' Blues," sung with power by guitarist/ vocalist Bob Weir.

The second disc is blessed by their 1970 gem, "Uncle John's Band," always enjoyable (it had just experienced a comeback in 1990,) as well as one of the best-played and surprisingly nicely sung (by the late lead guitarist/vocalist Jerry Garcia) run-through of "Lady With A Fan/Terrapin Station," from their Terrapin Suite of 1977. Drummers Billy Kreutzmann and Mickey Hart's "Drums" jam is frighteningly ambient and compelling.

For the third disc, "Space," a concert staple of the Dead, employing odd computer-generated sounds to guitars, bass (a quiet Phil Lesh) and keyboards, is the usual random mess, but like always there is a nice segue into Garcia/Hunter's "The Wheel." "All Along The Watchtower," by Bob Dylan is the pinnacle of the whole collection. The ferocity and precision with which they approach it is striking. Weir's lead vocals and Garcia's furious, distortion-guitar solo and the band's mind-numbing chemistry all combine for a live, majestic arrangement of the rock staple.

"Black Peter," a Garcia/Hunter blues from 1970's Workingman's Dead is just a great song, and a good addition to this collection. "Mud Love Buddy Jam" satisfies those who love the Dead's improvisational expertise. B+

Gibson held for Ransom in Howard's latest

Director's social commentary falls short in season's first potential mega-blockbuster

By Adam Levine
Collegian Staff

RANSOM
with Mel Gibson, Gary Sinise, Delroy Lindo directed by Ron Howard
Playing at Hampshire Six Theatres

After the super success of Braveheart, the whole world has been waiting in anticipation to see what Mel Gibson would do next. His new film Ransom, which had been previewed all throughout the summer blockbusters, appeared to be an intriguing new thriller as well as a satisfying post Braveheart effort.

In actuality, Ransom, although not a bad movie, is by no means as clever as it seems. What Ransom has to offer is nothing more than a well written, but far too pretentious action thriller.

Director Ron Howard has made a career of wholesome and well natured films. Cocoon and Parenthood are prime representations of family value oriented entertainment. In his latest film, he tests the boundaries of genre by mixing suspense while staying true to his family acceptable roots. The final project is a jumble of extreme emotions fighting with one another for screen time. The characters each feel far too much for an action film, but make no mistake— this is nothing more than a genuine action film.

Gary Sinese, who previously worked with Howard on his last film, Apollo 13, has proved his acting capabilities as a serious performer. He is chilling in his portrayal of police detective Jimmy Shaker, although the development of his character is rather weak. Shaker claims he has seen enough exploitation in our world, and therefore feels determined to fight back anyway he can. He reads about the shady business deals of airline entrepreneur Tom Mullen (Mel Gibson) and sees the perfect opportunity to take vengeance upon the rich and manipulative, and make some cash out of it too. He therefore decides to kidnap Mullen's son and hold him for ransom.

Mullen's character is far more well thought out than Shaker's. Gibson plays the role the way we would expect a wealthy business man to be, always in control. At the film's core, this issue of control is clearly it's message. How far would one go to secure the control that one has over others? Shaker doesn't like it Mullen's overwhelming control.

Mullen decides the best way to deal with this situation is to turn the tables around without for a second sacrifice his power. Although he must defy his wife (Rene Russo) and the F.B.I. agent (Delroy Lindo) assigned to help him, Mullen takes Shaker's ransom and transforms it into a bounty on his enemies head.

In the film's most haunting scene, a strange but altruistic metaphor is made. Shaker explains to Mullen the premise of the sci-fi classic Time Machine, about a world in the future where the beautiful people live on the Earth's surface and do nothing but play in an utopian environment. Down below, the ugly people live and slave their lives to support the ones who live above them. Every once in a while, an ugly person will sneak above and feed on one of the beautiful people. We can take Ransom from this point of view and understand that it too is criticism of the American class system. However, this aspect of the film leads to its emotional instability.

With all this social commentary, Howard feels the need to inflict certain wholesome values. Unlike the villain in Seven, Shaker never has the strength within his character to have him able to clearly rationalize his actions. This is conscious effort on Howard's part. He could have played up the hardships of the ugly people more, but instead he focuses on how kidnapping is no way to fight back against the rich man's tyranny. Gibson must first attempt to save his son through controlled wit, but only through buff strength can he defend himself from the ugly people who wish to feed of him.

By the film's end, Gibson has relived his days as an action hero, while attempting to be something more. Ransom is, if nothing more, sheer entertainment, but its inability to stay focused causes more confusion than necessary. B–

Spanking the Morphine

Boston's guitarless trio play Pearl St.

By Scott Bernard
Collegian Staff

Morphine proves that there is room in this overdriven, fuzzed-out world for a sound that is... guitarless. Consisting of two string slide-bassists, vocalist Mark Sandman, baritone saxophonist Dana Colley and drummer Billy Conway the five-year-old band has managed to make grooving yet hard- hitting music without the benefit of rock's most overused anachronism.

Formed in Cambridge in 1991, Morphine quickly struck a chord in the local music scene with its "light hearted experiment in darkness." Their first album, Good, released on Accurate-Distortion and subsequently re-released by Rykodisc received favorable airplay on many college radio stations, and also managed to win the Independent Album of the Year at the 1992 Boston Music Awards. Their follow- up, 1993's Cure for Pain, received immediate critical acclaim from such diverse magazines as Rolling Stone, Esquire, Vanity Fair, Downbeat and People, as well as riding high on Top 20 alternative radio charts for over six months.

They have recently released Yes, their third album on Rykodisc. Co-produced by Paul O. Kolderie (Hole, Radiohead, Dinosaur Jr.) and Sandman, the album's 12 cuts were roadtested on audiences from Austin to Tokyo. Two of the album's cuts, "Sharks Patrol These Waters," and "I Had My Chance" were recorded on the road by the band's soundman, Phil Davidson.

With the help of national television exposure on "MTV News," "The Conan O'Brien Show" and (obligatorily) "Beavis and Butthead," the band's word of mouth appeal has spread to a much wider audience. Also helping the band tremendously was their featured spot on the soundtrack to the award winning hit independent film, Spanking the Monkey.

But, in truth, the place where the band excels is on the road. Overcoming skeptics wary of the band's hype, Morphine ignited venues like the Troubador in Los Angeles and the South by Southwest Music conference. Morphine has played large festivals in England for 50,000 fans, and headlined New York City's Central Park Summerstage. However, the band prefers to take up residency in the same club over a series of nights, allowing for a more intimate experience for the band and its fans.

Overall, Morphine's eclectic and unique sound has defined what many now call "Low Music", and created what Rolling Stone has called an "underground pop success."

Morphine performs tonight at Pearl Street at 8 p.m. with special guest Wooden Leg. Call the club at 584-4256 for more information.

■ Dead

The Arista Years collects songs from the Dead's 1977– 1990 studio and live releases by the company for which it is titled. Most of Terrapin Station is here, save for the awful, disco rendition of "Dancin' In The Streets" and "Sunrise," sung by Donna Godchaux. The best song on this collection is, "Saint Of Circumstance" from 1980's Go To Heaven, but its companion, the Weir/John Perry Barlow tune, "Lost Sailor" sadly is not.

Yes, "Touch of Grey," was an obvious choice, but it's nice to see "West L.A. Fadeaway" from 1987's In The Dark as well as the Built To Last (1989) Garcia/Hunter ballad "Standing On The Moon." A good collection for non- completists. B

Note: Two other archival releases also came out this fall. Dick's Picks Vol. 6 is a full concert collected from Hartford, Conn. from Oct. 14, 1983. The VHS tape Ticket To New Year's is from New Year's Eve 1987–88. Call Grateful Dead Merchandising at 1–800–499–3998 for more info.

Manson: a pretend Antichrist

Shock rockers fail to break new ground on latest album

By Lisa M. Oliveri
Collegian Staff

MARILYN MANSON
Antichrist Superstar
Nothing / Interscope Records

It appears as if the reigning kings of shock rock are here to enlighten us once again — probably due to all that MTV airplay. But fans don't despair, Marilyn Manson hasn't really sold out, nor has frontman Reverend Manson committed suicide either. Their messages of hate, Satan, sodomy and torture still abound on Antichrist Superstar, their third release on the brainchild of Trent Reznor, Nothing Records.

This is a rock opera dedicated to Satan himself, an ode no one can sing quite as well as Marilyn Manson. It's outrageous, harsh and downright sick, and unfortunately — not new. Manson isn't trying to set standards on this album, that was already successfully accomplished on their debut Portrait of an American Family. The world already knows Mr. Manson is trying to instill terror into the angst-ridden youth, and most of the lyrics, samples and rhythms are just regurgitated from their first album.

Manson's lyrics are a cynical look at the decline of American values, so he would like his listeners to believe. Manson's own world is filled with sodomists, pedophiles and rapists. "We're TV/ spread me open, sticking to my pointy ribs are/ all your infants in abortion cribs/ I was born into this," Manson offers on "Man That You Fear." With his apocalyptic views, he seems more like a caricature out of Oliver Stone's Natural Born Killers than a rock star.

"Take your hatred out on me, make your victim my head," shouts Manson in "Tourniquet," almost begging to be the martyr God. The album's lyrics all weave together smoothly — Manson's has re-written his own scriptures.

A few funky samples are thrown together throughout this macabre journey. The music in "Cryptorchid," seems lifted right out of the cult-classic, The Perils of Gwendoline. On many of the other songs, Reznor demonstrates his creativity, and produces some interesting riffs. But for the most part, the music sounds no different from earlier Skinny Puppy or Front 242.

Much like his previous releases, the songs on Antichrist Superstar overflow with distorted guitars and fearful screams, his own screeching the icing on the bitter cake. But their is something strangely alluring about Mr. Manson and crew. His intense voice and charismatic personality draws listeners in and seizes them like a pissed-off black widow spider.

Is Marilyn Manson longed for this world — are they too destined to become a cult classic? Though Antichrist Superstar has its catchy moments, Manson is more about the image than the music. Without the scars, make-up or burning lunchboxes, their music would fail to hold anyone's interest for long. But the whole package should keep them around for a few years longer. B-

Jimmie Dale Gilmore provided a fun night of country at the Iron Horse Music Hall.

Gilmore: country legend

The lonesome Texan churns out the hits

By Bradley Skaught
Collegian Staff

JIMMIE DALE GILMORE
Iron Horse Music Hall
Nov. 10

NORTHAMPTON — There was a telling moment near the middle of Jimmie Dale Gilmore's Sunday night performance at the Iron Horse. Paused between songs, waiting for the musicians to finish tuning, Gilmore stepped up to the mike and, with a boyish grin, said, "This is fun!"

Playing in support of his latest album, Braver Newer World, Gilmore's setlist was a healthy mix of old favorites and newer songs— some yet to be released. It was a nearly flawless setlist, beginning with a gorgeous solo acoustic "Tonight I Think I'm Gonna Go Downtown," that immediately set the tone for the evening, with Gilmore's shimmering voice, strong and passionate. Band members joined Gilmore one by one over the course of the next three songs, building from the sparse "Tonight" to an explosive full band "There She Goes."

After that, there was no turning back. Gilmore's sidemen were incredibly able and diverse musicians, equally adept at tackling the lush, atmospheric pulse of the Braver material as they were the pounding roadhouse country. They played with startling clarity throughout— tasteful and energetic. They looked like a band better suited to a Friday night at CBGBs than a hired gun country band. Their spirit and musical spark was as much the show as Gilmore.

Not that Gilmore was upstaged, of course. As much a veteran of the Texas roadhouse as the concert hall, Gilmore took command of the stage from the very beginning— tender and hushed one minute, raging and howling the next. Gilmore was in peak form, his amazing voice even more powerful in person than on record. Gilmore also has the benefit of being able to pull songs from one of the most diverse and expressive song collections in America.

Perhaps only Johnny Cash has a songbook so full of human experience, humor, faith, love and sadness. Gilmore's tales of spirituality and discovery recall both the dusty expanse of the West Texas plains, and the shimmering lights of the big city— and the road in between. Perhaps only Gilmore could successfully claim Blind Lemon Jefferson's "Black Snake Moan" as his own— equally at home alongside songs by Sam Phillips, Joe Ely, and Gilmore's own startling originals.

All of this came into play Sunday night— all of this and more. Gilmore has secured his place in the American music pantheon, and he lived up to that reputation with a performance that was impassioned and exciting— the workings of true master craftsman and a grace to all who were present to hear it.

Five years of "The Larry Sanders Show"

By Jennifer Bowles
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Can you imagine David Duchovny, that brooding heartthrob from "The X-Files," in love with the offbeat, paranoid talk show host Larry Sanders?

Say it isn't so!

But that's the hilarious premise of the fifth season premiere episode of HBO's "The Larry Sanders Show," starring Garry Shandling, which airs at 9 p.m. EST Wednesday.

The idea came straight from Duchovny himself, Shandling says. "He plays basketball with me when he's here instead of Vancouver [filming 'The X-Files']," Shandling says. "One day on the basketball court he said, 'Wouldn't it be funny if Larry thought David Duchovny had a crush on him?'

"The next thing I knew, I had stolen the ball from him and scored two points. So then I said, 'That's a good idea,' so we did it. He's so funny in that, isn't he?" Shandling asks during a recent telephone conversation.

Yes, he is, and so is Shandling - star, creator, writer and executive producer of the critically acclaimed show, which focuses on the life of a fictitious late-night talk show host and the behind-the-scene madness of creating such a show.

It figures that Shandling would do a show like this - he has the perfect background as a stand-up comic and frequent "Tonight Show" guest host during the early to mid-1980s.

"It was purely to do something that

• He's survived three decades so far and is still going strong. David Bowie is releasing a new album shortly, and is drawing on many facets of Buddhism. His forthcoming album will be entitled Earthling and will include the song, "Seven Years in Tibet," which is also the title of Brad Pitt's new movie. The album is expected to be released in February.

• It seems as if many American culture-icons are ailing these days. Reports say that 89-year-old Katherine Hepburn has left her home in New York for her retreat in Old Saybrook, Conn., and lies on her death bed. She has had a number of health scares this year already, including pneumonia. Frank Sinatra remains quiet about his illness, but rumors still say he is suffering from heart problems. He was admitted to Cedars Sinai hospital in Los Angeles last week.

• The King of Pop will finally record the TV special, "Michael Jackson: One Night Only," which was cancelled when Jackson collapsed during rehearsals. It will now be filmed in South Africa. He also took the time to do a special interview on VH-1 that answers mailed-in questions from fans. Fans will be happy to hear that Jackson plans to play live dates in the United States as early as next year.

• This week's Antonio watch has produced an interesting (to say the least) twist. Mr. Mambo can be seen on French television helping an attractive blonde (that's real blonde, Melanie) wiggle into a pair of stockings, and then rolls them all the way up to the top of her thigh. Now that's pretty sexy — why can't we see that on American TV?

• The world's highest paid über-model Claudia Schiffer literally hung on for her life when the door of her private jet burst open in mid-air. Apparently Schiffer was quick on her feet — she removed her leather belt from her jeans with one hand and latched the door shut with the other. Now that's impressive! I doubt even magician David Copperfield would want to try that.

• It seems as if the world never tires of seeing Marilyn Monroe. After finding never before seen nude photos of the starlet, Playboy will feature the late-actress on the cover of their January '97 issue.

• According to Cybersleaze, the premiere of Ron Howard's new thriller Ransom left many stars, including Tim Allen so shaken that they left early to phone home and check on the safety of their own kids. Howard said that he is delighted with the response and that "it's nice to know the audience is getting involved."

• I guess Halloween is now the day to play sick jokes. Before shock-rocker Marilyn Manson took the stage at the New Jersey Convention Center, rumors circulated that he planned to commit suicide on stage. But just as the band was set to perform, a bomb-threat was called in. Both turned out to be a hoax. Gee, I knew people hated Manson, but wanting to bomb them...

• Let's see, -Fair Game — really bad movie. Richard Gere, Val Kilmer — really good actors. Cindy Crawford — wanna-be actress. See a pattern here? Crawford has moved on from her gerbil-toting husband and is now dating Kilmer. If talent won't get you that part, why not date someone who can?

• And lastly, according to Cybersleaze, WKUJ Station owner Tom Hodkins, who launched his contemporary hits station recently, gets the award for stupidest publicity stunt of the day. He reportedly kicked off his station by playing 36 straight hours of "The Macarena." Thank God we don't live there!

creatively was stimulating, in terms of creating something that would allow me as an actor to grow and become more reality-based," he says.

"Since I knew this world, I thought this might be a good arena to write about. It was either that or the pet shop business, which is what my mother does," he adds with his typical deadpan delivery.

Now, four years later, Shandling admits the pressure to come up with ideas for the show is getting more and more difficult. "It is so hard to come up with new things on the show, and I hope that was one that works," he says of the premiere. "It's like a relationship where you get to know the person and you're with them every day and you have to figure out how to make it fresh. And so I've been in therapy for the show for the last six months."

One way he deals with the problem is by focusing on timely issues. Ellen DeGeneres, who's rumored to come out as a lesbian on her series "Ellen" this season, is an upcoming guest on the show. "It's a very funny show in which Larry tries to get her to come on the talk show and talk about all the controversy on the show and there's a very interesting twist that happens," he says.

Being contemporary, though, also has landed him in a tight squeeze.

A scene this coming season dealing with Tupac Shakur had to be scrapped and replaced after the rapper was fatally shot in Las Vegas. And a reference to Morey Amsterdam had to be reshot after the comedian died recently.

"Unfortunately, that happens because the show is topical," Shandling says. "We went in yesterday and reshot and changed Morey Amsterdam to Steven Spielberg."

Aside from DeGeneres, upcoming guests on the show this season include Sally Field, Tim Conway, Sting and Warren Littlefield, just to name a few.

Continuing regulars include Jeffrey Tambor as Sanders' on-air sidekick and Rip Torn as his harried producer. Torn won an Emmy this year for best supporting actor in a comedy series.

Back only for a few episodes is Janeane Garofalo, who plays the talent booker. The actress is branching off to the big screen after the success of her film The Truth About Cats and Dogs. "Her character threatens to quit the show because she's been offered a job producing 'The Mommies' and then she stays on for one more episode," Shandling says. "Hopefully, she'll come back when she has time."

Time is something Shandling says he has little of, since much of his is spent writing for the show.

"That's the biggest problem in my life is that, not unlike many people who work on a television series, it becomes your life," he says. "I have very few free hours and I try to spend those hours resting and recuperating."

Tar Heels inching toward alliance

By David Droschak
Associated Press

CHAPEL HILL, N.C. — Even though No. 6 North Carolina is 8-1 and moving closer to a spot in a major bowl, coach Mack Brown doesn't want to hear about it. There are too many options left, too many games to play.

Weekend losses by Tennessee and Michigan — both viewed as the main competition in North Carolina's attempt to play in the Sugar, Fiesta or Orange Bowl — fueled speculation about the Tar Heels' postseason prospects. Brown, though, won't concern himself with that as the Tar Heels prepare to play No. 24 Virginia (6-3) on Saturday — a team that has beaten North Carolina seven straight times in Charlottesville, Va.

"We've been in that Fiesta Bowl hunt before and sat there and had no control," Brown said of the bowls. "It's really interesting to me, and I think it's a fan and media thing, for everybody to have their opinions every day when nobody has a clue. It's kind of fun."

"It's out there, it's real and it will be on TV all week, it will be in the newspapers all week. Our guys read. They watch TV. They are going to see it," Brown said of all the bowl talk around town and on campus. "We don't think they don't pay any attention to it. Sure, it's important to them."

"We told them, 'Right now, we're sixth in the country and if we can continue to play well, there are a lot of great things out there that can happen to ya. So, it's already changed from last week to this week and you didn't do anything but win. Some other people helped us.' We understand that and we don't want to be those other people."

If North Carolina can win its final two regular season games at Virginia and at Duke, other teams could help the Tar Heels rise in the polls.

The Tar Heels could inch up to No. 4 in the poll by selection time if No. 6 Colorado loses to No. 9 Kansas State and then beats No. 5 Nebraska and No. 1 Florida rolls over No. 3 Florida State, the only team to beat North Carolina. If Ohio State and Arizona State win out, they would be set for the Rose Bowl, which is not part of the three-bowl pact.

In addition, wild-card Notre Dame (6-2) must be ranked at least 12th in the nation to be considered for the Bowl Alliance. The Fighting Irish, a huge national television draw, are ranked No. 14 this week.

The Tar Heels haven't been to a major bowl since 1950, when Charlie "Choo-Choo" Justice led them to the Cotton Bowl. The thing I've told our team is if you're 10-1 and fourth in the country there will be some people fighting to get you so don't worry about it," Brown said. "If you are 8-3, you have a place to go. If you're 9-2, you'll have a better place to go. If we win, it will all take care of itself."

North Carolina was unranked in the preseason and picked to finish fourth in the ACC this season, but has been ranked in the top 15 for 10 straight weeks, including five consecutive weeks in the top 10.

"For us to be able to move to the top 10 is a compliment to the polls," Brown said. "I think some people must be looking at strength of schedule."

Army marching toward perfection

By Nekesa Mumbi Moody
Associated Press

WEST POINT, N.Y. — In the ranks of the best college teams this season, there is Florida, Ohio State and... Army?

Yes, Army. For the first time since 1985, the Black Knights (9-0) are ranked in the Top 25 — at No. 22 — and just might be playing in a bowl game by year's end.

But while some may question a team whose schedule so far has included just two teams with winning records and two Division I-AA schools, as far as the Black Knights are concerned, the national attention they're starting to get is a little overdue.

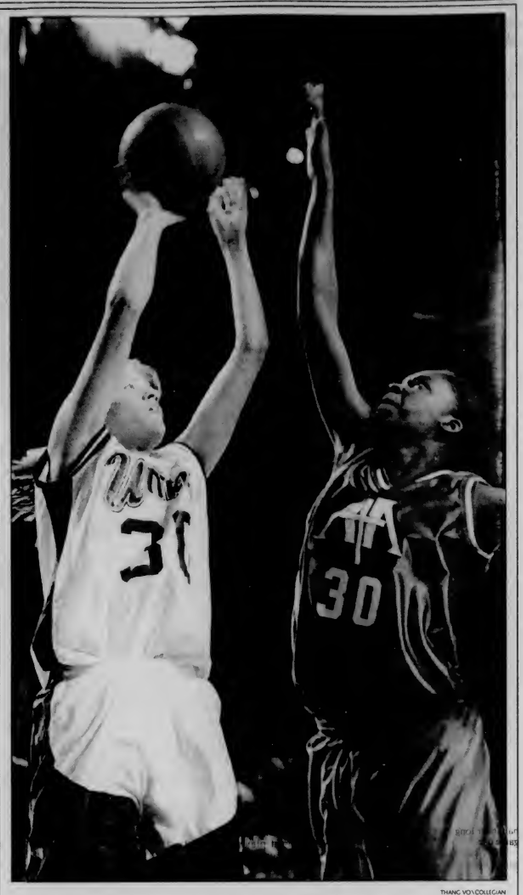
"If they don't give us respect, we've definitely earned it," said fullback Joe Hewitt, who had a career-high 161 yards on 29 carries and two touchdowns in Saturday's decisive 23-7 victory over Air Force at sold-out Michie Stadium.

"I don't see how anybody could not give us respect after this," he said.

They certainly got it from Air Force (5-4), stripping the Falcons of the Commander-In-Chief's Trophy they've held since 1988. Air Force saw its potent rushing attack, second-best in the nation at 354 yards per game, held to only 69 yards, and star quarterback Beau Morgan held to just 6 net rushing yards.

"The difference between what they do and what other teams do is that they just execute better," Morgan said. "It seemed like on every play they had at least one guy get off the block that wound up making the play."

Army's defense managed to pressure not only Morgan but Air Force's entire offensive line, allowing only one touchdown and forcing the Falcons to hand over the ball time and again.



"We were going three-and-out, giving the offense the ball back," Army linebacker Ben Kotwica said. "When you can keep their defense on the field, you're going to win the game."

The win snapped Army's seven-game losing streak against Air Force. And with just two more games left, against No. 19 Syracuse and Navy, the Black Knights remain in serious contention for a bowl berth, something they haven't achieved in eight years.

"I think with nine victories we've proven we are a good team and we deserve to be considered for different things," said Army coach Bob Sutton. "Our team has answered the bell every single week and done everything asked of them. To me, the thing I've enjoyed about this team is that they've been an improved football team every [game]."

It's a far cry from last year, when Army finished the season 5-5-1 and could only take comfort in knowing that it beat Navy in the annual matchup.

"Last year we hoped that we were good; that's what one of the coaches was saying to us," Hewitt said. "And this year we know we're good. There's that confidence behind us all, and we know we can work as a team."

number. They were making plays."

Smith finished the day 13-for-26, but was only 4-for-11 for 24 yards in the second half, including two interceptions. Freshman wideout Raphael Quinn had his best day as a Minuteman, with five catches for 47 yards, breaking UMass legend Rene Ingoglia's freshman reception record in the process.

Cook wound up 15-for-26 with 226 yards and a touchdown. Junior tailback Alvin Porch, who came into Saturday second in the YanCon in rushing, paced the Tribe ground attack with 65 yards on 22 carries, and sophomore Tony Harris chipped in 49 yards on 12 rushes.

The Spectacular Rise of UMass Basketball

In Going Bigtime, local author Marty Dobrow takes a colorful and comprehensive look at the University of Massachusetts basketball program. He plunges into the rich history of the Minutemen that includes the collegiate careers of legendary figures Julius Erving and Rick Pitino. Mostly, he chronicles the astonishing rise of the basketball program from one of the nation's worst in the 1980s to one of the best today. The rise created tremendous excitement and led to numerous benefits for an oft-beleaguered university, but it was accompanied by considerable controversy and a palpable loss of innocence. Dobrow shows readers both sides of the story.

Minutewomen go 2–1 on weekend

By Jeremy Adams
Collegian Staff

It was a weekend of opportunities for the Massachusetts volleyball team. The Minutewomen entered the weekend approaching the defining moment of their season, a chance to advance in the conference standings, and to establish themselves as one of the best teams in the region.

The inexperienced squad may have been intimidated by these opportunities, as it brought itself up to Temple's level, defeating conference doormats Fordham and La Salle, and then proved it didn't want to be there by losing to the Owls in five games.

Fordham lived up to its 1–14 conference record, bowing to Massachusetts in three games on Friday night. The Rams tried to contain the Minutewomen, losing the first two games by the respectable scores of 15–7 and 15–6, but had to step out of the way of the up–and–coming home team, who swept them right out of the Cage with a 15–2 thrashing in game three.

High scorers included senior Dionne Nash, who led the way with 8 kills and 10 digs. Sophomore setter Katie Pearce accounted for four points on her own, with four serving aces.

La Salle also proved to be deserving of its 1–15 record, scoring a total of four points in the three games they shared the court with the Minutewomen. Junior Michelle Paciorek and freshman Sarah Watters each chipped in 8 kills to follow Nash's 13 kills and 11 digs in the trouncing.

Massachusetts rolled 15–2, 15–2, and 15–0 in the warm–up for the showdown with Temple. The match against the Owls was made more crucial by the two previous wins, and Temple's loss to Rhode Island which moved them into a tie for third place with the Minutewomen.

The two teams battled it out for five games at the Curry Hicks Cage on Saturday night, with third place in the Atlantic 10 on the line, as well as the mathematical possibility of advancing further up in the ranks. Only the top four teams in the conference make the A–10 tournament, which will be held Thanksgiving weekend at Rhode Island.

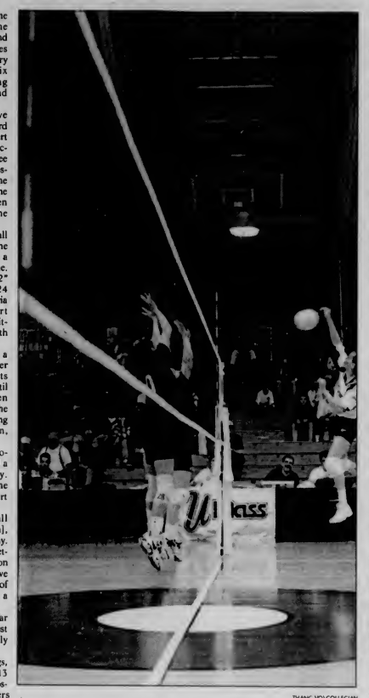
Massachusetts took the early lead over Temple, winning the first game 16–14. Temple had the momentum at the start of the game, but the Minutewomen rallied back from deficits of 5–1 and 9–14 to win the half–hour long epic struggle that was game one.

The Titans continued to clash in game two, after which the match was tied 1–1. The Owls took the game 15–9, capitalizing on some Minutewomen defensive miscues and a beneficial call from the referees late in the game. It had started very evenly, until Temple made a six point run at 8– 7, leaving Massachusetts shell–shocked and anxious for the intermission.

Massachusetts seemed to have regained its composure in the third game, taking the lead from the start and methodically completing the victory with short runs of two or three points on almost every service possession. The game went to the home team by a score of 15–11, and the confidence of the Minutewomen seemed to show the direction the match was heading in.

Once again, the Owls spoiled all the fun, ripping the lead from the hands of the Minutewomen with a 15–7 disciplining in the fourth game. Temple's attack, led by junior 6'2" middle blocker Temu Cooper's 24 kills and 5'10" outside hitter Sharla Bryant's 20 kills, picked apart Massachusetts' middle defense, hitting .375 with 14 kills in the fourth game.

The match came down to a rally–scoring scenario in the rubber game, in which every serve counts for a point. It was a close game until the teams changed sides when Temple led 8–6. From that point the Owls didn't look back, dominating every serve but one from then on, winning 15–7.



"Our middle blocking was atrocious [in the last two games]," said a frustrated coach Bonnie Kenny. "Our middle back defense became atrocious. The middle of the court killed us all night.

"I thought we hit the ball inbounds [in the games we won], our hitting went to pot," Said Kenny. "The last two matches we played better when there wasn't a challenge on the other side of the net. When we had a challenge on the other side of the net, we couldn't respond in a positive way."

"I think this is a real setback as far as character," said Kenny. "We just broke down at things we're usually pretty good at."

Nash provided 21 kills and 12 digs, and freshman Jill Meyers provided 13 kills and three block assists in the losing effort. These positive numbers were not enough to offset figures like 37 attacking errors, and a combined .070 hitting percentage from the middle blocker position. Another ratio that dictated doom for the home team was Massachusetts' eight total team blocks, compared to Temple's 18.

"We stopped playing, stopped talking as a team, and that's what hurt us tonight," said Nash.

THANG VO/COLLEGIAN

Jill Meyers and the UMass women's volleyball team lost to Temple this weekend at the Curry Hicks Cage.

Currently, Rhode Island (13–1) is a lock for the tournament, while Dayton (14–2) and Temple (12–4) are still in the running for the top seed. With the loss to Temple, the Minutewomen can still challenge for third place, but have to also concern themselves with 10–6 Xavier and 9–6 Virginia Tech.

The Minutewomen attempt to regroup against Boston College at the Cage tomorrow at 7 p.m.

"She feels very confident, and I think that exudes through the rest of the team."

Before getting to the championship, UMass first faced fourth–seeded Temple, a squad it had beaten, 3–1, in the regular season.

Laura Phelan notched the eventual game–winner for the Minutewomen on a penalty corner with 23:24 left before halftime. Putnam sent the ball into a waiting Fuchs at the top of the circle, Rothenberger faked a shot, and in a split– second, Fuchs sent the ball to Phelan who cranked a score past Owl goalie Deb Brown.

"We studied how their defensive corners were, and we worked on it in practice yesterday, and it went through," Phelan said.

Temple had a chance to tie the game with just under nine minutes left, but Rose stopped the charge, coming out of the net to make a clean stick save, her only stop of the afternoon.

"The save had to be made, and I was in the right place at the right time," Rose said.

Hixon was happy to have Rose in her net.

"With any other goalie, collegiately in the U.S., I'd want to have Hilary playing that one–on–one," Hixon said.

The Minutewomen added an insurance goal late in the contest when Courtney MacLean redirected a Phelan hit into the Temple circle for a goal with 4:03 left on the clock.

Minutewomen Notes: Four UMass players were named to the All–Tournament team: Fuchs; Rothenberger; Phelan; and junior sweeper Amy Ott.., five Minutewomen made the All–Conference team which was announced Friday night: Rose; Fuchs; Rothenberger; Ott; and sophomore forward Erica Johnston.

High–schooler gets ref back

GALLUP, N.M. (AP) — A Wingate High School football player faces a felony battery charge following his arrest for tackling a referee from behind after being ejected from a game.

Gilbert Jefferson, 18, remained jailed today at the McKinley County Detention Center on charges of aggravated battery on a school employee. He was arrested during Wingate's game Friday night against visiting Crownpoint.

Assistant District Attorney Michael Sanchez said an investigation was continuing, but Jefferson could face up to 18 months in prison and a $5,000 fine.

Referee Allen Bainter was discharged Sunday from Rehoboth McKinley Christian Hospital. His wife, Pat, said her husband had been knocked unconscious and suffered a concussion.

"He said he remembers going to the game, but that was about all," she said. "It's ridiculous. I don't understand it, but I'm not surprised anymore. It's just amazing what's happening in sports these days."

The game was declared a forfeit, giving Crownpoint a 1-0 win. The loss denied Wingate a spot in the state playoffs and gave Tohatchi the District 6AAA runner-up spot and post-season berth. Wingate, a predominantly Navajo Indian school, was leading 22-18 in the fourth quarter when Jefferson, a running back and linebacker, was called for unsportsmanlike conduct.

Jefferson protested and went to the sidelines. Moments later, he ran back onto the field and struck Bainter from behind.

"[Jefferson] had about 35 yards head start, running at full speed," said Crownpoint coach Tim Garro.

Added McKinley County Sheriff's Sgt. John Kendall, "He rang the ref's bell pretty bad. The guy couldn't remember his name when the paramedics asked him."

Wingate coach Gary Schuster declined comment, and principal Adam Bull said school officials would discuss the incident Tuesday. The school is closed today because of the Veterans' Day holiday. "We are investigating it ourselves," Bull said. "We want to do the right things for the kid and the officials."

It's not the first problem to crop up in New Mexico high school football this fall.

St. Pius High School senior center Mike Cito, accused of playing with a razor-sharp helmet buckle that injured opponents, was expelled from the Roman Catholic school in Albuquerque on Oct. 14. Referees stopped the Oct. 12 game between St. Pius and Albuquerque Academy after several Academy players received cuts during play. A check of the football equipment revealed Cito's helmet buckle was sharp enough to shred a magazine cover.

Cito was expelled after St. Pius principal, the Rev. Ronald Schwenzer, said the boy's father, dentist Stephen Cito, dismissed sharpening the buckle because he felt his son had been roughed up in another game one week earlier.

THEFT OF MEDICAL EXAM FOILED IN S.F.

17-year-old With Nonfunctioning Gun Beaten by Students

By H. K. Lee and C. Bowman, Chronicle Staff Writers

A young masked gunman burst into a room full of students taking a medical exam Saturday in San Francisco and demanded a copy of a test section but was thwarted when several outraged proctors and would-be doctors punched him out, police said yesterday.

Police said the youth grabbed a green folder at the front of the room, disappeared into a bathroom and then re-emerged, cursing. He then confronted a proctor, demanding the Physical Sciences portion of the test. As the proctor fumbled for the test section, the youth may have been careless with his gun—the proctor grabbed it, and suddenly the intruder found himself at gunpoint.

The youth then apparently smacked the proctor in the face. Enraged, at least five proctors and test-takers surrounded the suspect and threw punches at him, drawing blood, witnesses said...

why we can't score three. You've just got to get out there and work and catch them on their heels.

"I just asked them to give me a chance to pull the goalie. That's all."

With Tom O'Connor in the box with what was judged as interference in the eyes of referee Steve McBride, UMass cut the gap to two goals at the 4:09 mark.

Judd Smith rushed the puck up the right wing, forcing UNH goaltender Brian Larchelle come well out of his net to make a John Casey–esque poke check on the on-rushing Smith. The slide was successful, but the deflected puck went right to Brad Norton, who fired it into an empty–net.

Rob Bonneau made it a 4–3 game 1:46 later converting on a feed from Tom Perry.

Now a one–goal game, it was time for Regan to shine and keep his team in the game, which he did again stoning Nickulas, stopping a point–blank power play shot by the Cushing Academy product with nine minutes left in regulation with his new Tazmanian Devil mask.

UMass finally evened the score at four goals apiece at the 13:50 mark as Chris Fawcett and Cahill worked a give–and– go on the left side of a 3–on–2 rush for Fawcett's fourth goal of the year.

Regan once again kept his team in the game, turning out perhaps the biggest save of the entire weekend just before overtime. With players and fans alike preparing themselves for the extra session, Mowers was still looking at what was left on the clock. Mowers, UNH's top scorer, collected a loose puck in the center ice area and broke in all alone and untouched on Regan who denied his scoring bid with a kick save with 10 seconds left in regulation.

The overtime period lasted just 49 seconds, as Krog won the game for UNH with a blistering 25–foot slap shot on a 3–on–2 break.

Just as it took one shot to win Saturday's contest, Friday's was decided with a single flick of the wrist. The 1–0 decision had fans gripping the edges of their seats despite the lopsided play.

The single goal represents the fewest UMass has allowed in a Hockey East contest since joining the league two years ago, but the shutout snapped a 47 consecutive game string for the Minutemen of not being shutout, dating back to a 7–0 pay–back loss at Maine on Feb. 11, 1995.

The opening two periods were scoreless, thanks primarily to an unbelievable performance turned in by Moriarty.

Usually an overlooked back–up, Moriarty has proved himself worthy in recent starts against BU and UNH of far more ice time during the remainder of his senior season. The work of the Wilbraham native and Deerfield Academy alum over the past two weeks is the best of his career, and certainly is not the last the UMass faithful will see of Moriarty.

UNH was able to sustain its pressure on Moriarty for much of Friday's contest, played before a holiday weekend crowd of 3,129. Yet, for 43:21, dual goose–eggs remained in place on the scoreboard in a contest that suddenly resembled a soccer match.

Finally the deadlock was broken by Mowers on a third period power play. Moriarty made the initial stop on Nickulas, but the man–down Minutemen did not cover Mowers, who pushed home the rebound.

The besieged Moriarty wound up making 40 saves in the contest, the most by a UMass netminder since Regan made 49 saves at Maine last season.

Something that forced Moriarty to get such a workout on Friday was an overall apathy exhibited at times by the team, in the defensive zone in particular. Saturday night, UMass did not roll over and play dead against a more talented opponent, but rather scrapped and played a solid hard–nosed hockey game.

The benefits of the style of play was obvious even if the end result reflected no difference in the means. At some point this year play like Saturday night's will result in a different ending in a well–balanced league.

"One thing that we have to take pride in is that if we work at the same level that we worked tonight, we're going to win a lot of games," Mallen said. "One of the positive for us tonight was getting to the net and playing physical."

Patriots survive NY scare

By Barry Wilner
Associated Press

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. — With his team deep in a hole, New England coach Bill Parcells issued a challenge. He got exactly the response he sought.

The Patriots spotted the New York Jets a 21-point lead, then rallied to win 31-27 Sunday — with the aid of a controversial spot by the officials and with impetus provided by Parcells' halftime dare.

"I told them there still was time to win the game, and they needed to decide if they still wanted to be champions," Parcells said. "I'm real proud. We escaped today and showed a lot of class."

The victory was the fourth straight in the AFC East for the Patriots (7-3), who remained tied for the division lead with Buffalo. They capped their comeback with Drew Bledsoe's 2-yard touchdown pass to Keith Byars with 4:03 remaining.

New England's winning drive stayed alive when Ben Coates was given a very generous spot on a short reception on fourth-and-2 to the Jets 49. He didn't appear to even reach midfield, but was given the first down by line judge Charles Stewart.

"I went to where the ball was and where I thought he was," Stewart said. "I went to where I thought the ball was at." That was good enough for Coates.

"They know more about it than I do," he said.

The Jets (1-9) didn't think so.

"It was blatant," Jets defensive end Hugh Douglas said. "When you are 1-8, those things happen. You don't get those calls." A 28-yard pass to rookie Terry Glenn on a fleaflicker led to Byars' score.

"That's what playoff teams do," Byars said of the comeback. "You get your nose bloodied and it's, 'What are you going to do when you get hit?' We weren't going to panic. If you panic now, in November, you won't get a chance to panic in January, when they hand out the awards."

The Jets got to the Patriots 11 in the final minute before four incompletions ended the game.

New England climbed out of its big hole and tied it on Bledsoe's 17-yard pass to Coates early in the fourth quarter. Curtis Martin's 31-yard run with a short pass, on which four Jets missed tackles, sparked the drive.

The Jets responded with a 48-yard pass from Frank Reich to Richie Anderson, setting up Nick Lowery's 32-yard field goal. But losing teams don't get the breaks, and the Jets fell short again, losing their ninth in a row at home.

"You've got to play hard for 60 minutes," Reich said. "If you're playing hard with a big lead, you have to try to make it a bigger lead."

Bledsoe finished 24-for-34 for 297 yards and three touchdowns. The early going featured a serious case of role reversal. The Patriots couldn't do anything right. The Jets forced three turnovers and had two sacks.

After an 80-yard drive with the opening kickoff culminated in Reich's perfect 26-yard touchdown pass to Jeff Graham, New York's defense took charge. It held the Patriots to one yard of offense in the opening period, twice picked off passes and forced a fumble. Bledsoe's weak throw to Glenn hung in the air, and cornerback Aaron Glenn intercepted it on New England's first possession. Then, following a short punt and Dave Meggett's 14-yard return, the Patriots started at the Jets 25. But the Jets got another turnover when Terry Glenn tipped Bledsoe's pass and safety Victor Green made a diving interception.

On New England's next series, Chad Cascadden sacked Bledsoe and Douglas — back from a six-week layoff with a broken ankle — recovered a fumble at the Patriots 29. After Reich's slow-motion 9-yard run on third down got a first down, Adrian Murrell scored from the 1.

Murrell, who rushed for 128 yards, made it 21-0 with a 1-yard run to cap a 60-yard drive on which he had rushes of 26 and 12 yards.

Then things got back to normal.

The Patriots finally got going when Shawn Jefferson caught a deflected pass to convert a third down. That started an 80-yard drive to Glenn's 26-yard TD reception late in the first half. "That might have been the turning point," Bledsoe said. "Shawn outfought them for the ball and we went on to score."

Bledsoe at one stretch completed 11 straight passes. He guided New England 67 yards with the second-half kickoff to Martin's 1-yard run, making it 21-14. Willie Clay intercepted an overthrown pass and returned it 35 yards to the Jets 48 moments later, leading to Adam Vinatieri's 30-yard field goal.

Lowery matched that with a 26-yarder with 22 seconds left in the third period.

launching a low strike from about 20 yards out.

But that goal would not silence Dayton. They came back with more than admirable fervor, and counterattacked relentlessly. The fourth consecutive A–10 Championship for UMass flew away in the southern Rhode Island gusts, as the Flyers stormed back with two goals in the last 17 minutes, making the improbable probable with a final score of 3–2. A crossbar shot by Shimogaki, and a late bid by freshman Kate Webb was not enough for the Minutewomen.

"To appreciate soccer was to watch their team, which had no hope, until they scored that goal [to make it 2–2], develop hope and pull it out," Rudy said. "I told [assistant coach] Chris [Chamides] after we scored [to make it 2–1], that the way things were going, and without people stepping up and... basically, without real leadership, I wouldn't be surprised if we get scored on in the next minute or two.

"Then with the last six minutes to go, I said, 'Jesus, we're just laying back here, and I think its going to happen again,' and sure enough, there it was."

In Chamides' words, Friday's game against GW could "officially be called a war." The battlefield had a difference from their last matchup on Oct. 6, though, as senior defender Erin Lynch made her first–ever start in midfield. Rudy's coaching decision left UMass with a three back set, as Iverson, and sophomores Robin Smith and Amanda Thompson, had to contain GW's forward Chemar Smith.

It could have been a wonderful thing for UMass, because the multi–dimensional Lynch can basically play anywhere. But she was hampered with an hamstring injury suffered last weekend at the Post Oak Mall Classic in College Station, Texas, and through no fault of her own, was a non–factor. What was a factor in this game was GW's Smith, and she and A–10 Player of the Year Tanya Vogel gave UMass troubles throughout the first half. The score was tied 0–0 at the half, but the Colonials definitely held the advantage.

"GW is the most difficult team for us, and at times they were the better team today," Rudy said. "The amazing story here is the fact that we pulled this out with Erin Lynch playing at one–quarter speed.

"Basically, we wanted to pull [Lynch] off, and if I pulled her off, she would have killed me," Rudy continued, with Lynch listening on in the background. "So, I wanted to live for at least another weekend."

GW came out fast in the second half. In the first minute Vogel tested Dion early from a setup from Smith, but the junior keeper made the diving stop to her left. But UMass slowly began to take control of the pitch, with the whole team beginning to shut down the Colonials. The two central midfielders, Julie Magid and Tarah Tokarchik, began to control the middle, while freshman forward Kate Webb broke through on counters, holding the ball in GW's end.

The gamewinner came through Kurowski. She was sent in alone on GW keeper Traci Jensen from a misplay on a cross from Iverson. As Iverson's ball bounced over the head of a GW defender, and Kurowski chipped the ball over Jensen, putting UMass up for good at the 51:43 mark.

"We only played three backs, which is a gamble against their speed," Rudy said. "With Erin out, we couldn't use her as a marking back, so we floated as an attacker at the half, and with 18 minutes to go, we floated her a little deeper."

"But I tell you what, some people really picked up their game. The half–time message was, '[Amy] Powell and Shimo, you have to pick it up,' and they did. But I told Emma this week, you are no longer a freshman, don't play like one, and she didn't."

What kept UMass in this match all night long was Dion. The three time A–10 All–Conference selection made sparkling save after sparkling save. With 17:30 left in the match, the junior keeper made the save of the season, fully extending to her right to stop a Smith blast.

"I can't do it without my team, and I didn't even think of that save as a big–time save, it is something you have to do," Dion said. "If you don't do it, you don't keep your job back there.

THANG VO/COLLEGIAN

Tina Lightning and the UMass women's soccer team lost the A–10 final to Dayton, 3–2 on Sunday.

Playoff picture takes shape after the 11th week

By Dave Goldberg
Associated Press

Back in the '50s, there was a comic strip character called a "shmoo." You could knock it down, kick it, pound it, bounce it and it still bounced back.

The Dallas Cowboys are the shmoos of the NFL in 1996.

Despite the travails of the first half of the season, Dallas is still standing. More than just standing in fact, after a Sunday in which it was the only NFC power to win, a 20–17 overtime victory in the showdown in San Francisco.

Listen to Deion Sanders on Fred Strickland's interception that set up the tying touchdown late in the fourth quarter: "That wasn't the play of the day, that was the play of the year." On a day that could have ended with the Cowboys at .500, three games out of first in the NFC East, Dallas is now 6-4 and one game out. Any bets the Cowboys won't win their fifth straight division title?

Not here.

With 10 games gone and six left, it's a good time to look at the playoff picture, with one caveat — depth. Steve Young had his second concussion of the season Sunday, John Elway played with a pulled hamstring and the salary cap makes most teams thin. "We may not have the best 22 starters in the league but we could have the best 45 players," says Marty Schottenheimer, Kansas City's astute coach.

When playoff time comes, that could be a major factor.

NFC

Despite a 27-20 loss in Kansas City in which the defense gave up 383 yards, 182 on the ground, Green Bay controls the conference, although the injuries keep coming. Tight end Mark Chmura, who sprained an arch Sunday, is the latest Pro Bowler to go down. Still, it's unlikely the Packers will be challenged in the Central and they have only two games left against teams with winning records — at Dallas next Monday night in the NFL's next game of the year and at home to Denver Dec. 8. They should finish no worse than 12-4, and if they do, they're likely to get home field for the playoffs.

Unless Dallas wins the rest of the way. That would give the Cowboys the tiebreaker because one of those wins will be over the Packers.

If the Cowboys beat Green Bay, they could indeed run the table. Washington, whom they play twice, is fading and the Cowboys get New England at home.

But Dallas has been erratic — down for a narrow win over Atlanta at home, up for a big win in Miami, down again for a loss to Philadelphia and up on Sunday in San Francisco. If the Cowboys flatten out next week against Green Bay, forget it.

The best guess: Dallas and Philadelphia go down to the wire in the East, Green Bay wins the Central and San Francisco the West. Give Carolina and the East loser a wild-card berth although the Panthers, 5-0 at home and 1-4 on the road, have to figure out how to play away from Ericsson Stadium

And add Washington if it can correct its severe defensive problems (522 passing yards to Boomer Esiason, who had 512 in four games before Sunday).

The other contenders: Maybe Detroit can save Wayne Fontes again, but Minnesota seems in a terminal fade.

AFC

Denver (9-1) is two games better than anyone else in the conference. Barring disaster (Elway's hamstring), the Broncos should get home field, although four of their last six games are on the road, including trips to New England next Sunday and Green Bay on Dec. 8.

New England and Buffalo (each 7-3) should battle it out in the East and both should make the playoffs as Indianapolis and Miami fade under the weight of injury and inexperience. Pittsburgh (7-3) should win the Central and Kansas City (7-3) looks like a good bet for another wild-card.

That leaves one spot, with Houston (6-4) the front-runner. But there are plenty of others, and it's still too early to tell:

- San Diego, now that Stan Humphries is back.
- Seattle, which has won three in a row and four of five to get to .500.
- The Colts or the Dolphins, both 5-5. Jimmy Johnson says he thinks he could get in at 9-7.
- The Bengals, 4-6 but 3-0 under Bruce Coslet. Coslet might have to finish 9-0 to make it.

Loose Bruce Coslet has yet to lose since replacing Dave Shula, the latest victory being the Bengals' 34-24 upset of Pittsburgh on Sunday.

Coslet is clearly benefiting from the adrenaline a team gets from a coaching change. He's also playing modest.

"The difference is the players," he says. "They're prepared for games."

Coslet was 26-39 as coach of the Jets from 1990-93. Rich Kotite is 4-22 with the Jets as Coslet's replacement (once removed) following the debacle against New England in which New York blew a 21-0 lead.

UM off to NCAA's

Leigh Torbin

I've learned one thing above all else from two and a half years of covering UMass athletics, both through slaving away in the Media Relations office, and chronicling our teams in these pages. It is something that no Sport Management professor has yet to, or ever, will teach me before I hopefully graduate from this fine institution.

This truth being that, including the Kennedy Assassination, the NFL's wild–card tiebreakers, the composition of several D.C. meals, and the lyrics to the chorus of "Here and Now" by Beantown's own Letters to Cleo, there is no greater mystery than an NCAA selection committee.

You just never know.

I have seen our softball team host a regional tournament over a higher–seeded team, whose coach is the chair of the selection committee. I have seen last year's men's lacrosse and the 1994 field hockey teams, both quality clubs, with their bags rightfully packed, and stunningly no place to go.

For that reason, I said my peace after the women's soccer team lost to Dayton on Sunday, realizing full well that despite another great season, I might never see their sublimated black uniforms again this season.

Soccer fans kept a candle burning by the altar, but knew this could well be the end.

The Atlantic 10 personified as a women's soccer conference would bear a striking resemblance to the Stay–Puft Marshmallow Man from Ghostbusters. Knowing full well that they had committed the cardinal sin of losing to an A–10 team, heads were down and tears were a–flowin' on the Minutewoman bench when the final horn sounded. Their hopes and dreams apparently, like the A–10 championship trophy itself, tangled up in blue.

A poet the caliber of Dylan Thomas would have difficulty capturing the emptiness on the bench. Something was missing and it was not the on–the–field presence of Lynch and Rebecca Myers. Watching team UMass minus these two was like watching the Chicago Bulls without both Michael Jordan and Scottie Pippen. Things were tolerable without Myers all year, but UMass without the duo was a sandwich without either peanut butter or jelly.

Through years of working with our softball team, I have grown to have a tremendous amount of respect for Elaine Sortino, and have seen her in all sorts of emotional states; times of victory and horrific losses like Sunday's.

The look in her eyes before and after having the unenviable task of handing Dayton their trophy, as the chair of the A–10 women's soccer committee, said it all. Two people with reputations for talking people's heads off looked at each other painfully and not a word was spoken, the church bells all but broken, both thinking that we should have caught that last train for the coast.

Along with my verbose co–writer and the incomparable Mike Reiss, we had made the trek to the Ocean State wondering if this would be the last we'd see of perhaps our most beloved team, and its illustrious class of seniors.

Knowing well the NCAA's incongruities and that UMass already found itself on the bubble, we tailgated in as high style as URI officials would permit, and did this potentially final match right, as a somber feeling sat over our well–spiced chicken.

The match itself did nothing to ease our nerves, as three well–traveled women's soccer chroniclers headed north on route 146, just going down the road feeling bad, bad, bad.

After 18 hours to recuperate, the can't–learn–this–in–a–classroom lessons which I have learned about the NCAA returned to me. Using the same rules that had us host last year's softball regional, I saw my world brighten with a confident hunch that the Minutewomen would get sent to Connecticut when the seedings were announced yesterday.

Truth be told, they could have received the last seed in the nation and gotten shipped to No. 1 Notre Dame, and euphoria would prevail. The sentiments of UMass' southerner–laden team are echoed by Holliston–born country singer Jo Dee Messina, who recently hit No. 1 by singing:

"Heads, Carolina; tails, California... Up in the mountains or down by the ocean, where it don't matter as long as we're going somewhere."

Thinking that things were even greater, I would have been ecstatic to have my byline appear in this paper on Monday above a dateline of CHAPEL HILL, N.C.

Instead Sunday at 1:00 p.m. I'll be heading not to legendary Fetzer Field, the Yankee Stadium of women's collegiate soccer, or even rustic Storrs, Conn., but rather home to Harvard's Ohiri Field.

Legally Cambridge — although the field's actually in Allston — is neither greener or warmer, but it doesn't matter. We're going somewhere.

University squad.

Freshmen Rich Slinguff and Bill Hunter each tallied goals in the first round contest. Gabriel Marrero, who garnered second–team All–Easterns honors, pitched in a two–point score and an assist.

Engin stopped 16 Slippery Rock scoring attempts in the victory while Gonen and Aldo Roman played nearly impenetrable defense.

The win advanced UMass to the semi–finals where they swam off against regular–season nemesis No. 12 Navy.

The defensive efforts of Gonen, Roman and Engin (12 saves) keyed a completely dominant performance from the Minutemen as they won convincingly, 10–5, continuing their trend of losing to Navy in the regular season and then beating them in the Eastern Championships.

HOROSCOPES

ARIES
March 21–April 20

Don't seek to avoid difficulty – you could miss out on a lesson you really need to learn. You're lucky in love, but don't trumpet this news too loudly; someone close to you may be feeling pretty lonesome.

TAURUS
April 21–May 21

Working for a promotion is rewarding, but difficult, so allow yourself to be pampered if you're lucky enough to receive an offer. Romance flourishes as the weather grows balmy.

GEMINI
May 22–June 21

Tension builds at work as a deadline approaches. Put in the extra time and finish ahead of schedule. You'll look good in the eyes of someone whose influence is growing. An enjoyable conversation could lead to some startling insights.

CANCER
June 22–July 22

A crabby person gets the week off to a sour start. Ignore irrational behavior as much as possible. There could be more involved than meets the eye. Invite a third party to participate in an important meeting.

LEO
July 23–August 23

If something's been bothering you lately, try sitting down in a quiet room and thinking your way to the heart of the matter. If you're honest with yourself, you may discover something that will help you improve your mood.

VIRGO
August 24–September 22

Spring cleaning could turn up a host of useless items that have been in storage for a long time. Make plans to clear them out. You'll enjoy having the extra room.

LIBRA
September 23–October 23

An emphasis on values allows you to make a decision you'll be happy with for years to come. Seek advice from someone with experience. Follow the advice of a trusted friend or mate when it comes to your finances.

SCORPIO
October 24–November 22

Your energy knows no bounds, so go ahead and tackle that huge project. If you break it down into smaller chunks, you could ride your wave of enthusiasm for weeks to come. A platonic relationship begins to show romantic undertones.

SAGITTARIUS
November 23–December 21

Although it's tempting to offer unsolicited advice, it may not be productive. Rather, you may have to work on remaining calm and patient while another person fumbles the ball a few times.

CAPRICORN
December 22–January 20

Work towards completing a large assignment early in the week. Conflicts at work could sap your energy towards the weekend, but if you exercise your skills at drawing up compromises, all will not be lost. A gift for your sweetie is in order.

AQUARIUS
January 21–February 18

Although it feels as though you're getting nothing done, you're laying the groundwork for an important project coming up soon. Focus on details and get things done right the first time around.

PISCES
February 19–March 20

You may be feeling impulsive this week, so try to lay low and consider your actions before you do anything. A conservative approach works wonders when it comes to your wallet.

UM Water polo stakes claim to Eastern title

Back in the saddle again.

Tournament MVP Brian Stahl netted four goals, and senior co-captain Paul Engin stopped 18 Queens College shots as the No. 16 Massachusetts men's water polo team earned their fourth consecutive Eastern Championship beating No. 15 Queens in the title match, 10–8, in Cambridge this weekend.

UMASS	10

The Minutemen are just the second water polo squad in Eastern history to win four straight championships, following the Bucknell teams of the late '70s.

With the tournament victory, UMass has secured its fourth consecutive berth in the NCAA tournament.

"They knew they had to play hard to win the tournament," UMass coach Russ Yarworth said after picking up his 200th career victory. "They really answered the call; I really pushed them hard this week."

Senior co-captain Ron Gonen especially answered Yarworth's call to arms handing out four assists in the final and stifling whomever he defended in the championships.

"Ron played the best defense of anybody in the tournament," Yarworth said. "All year long I've been saying that we only have two seniors, and are an extremely young team. But, those two guys [Gonen and Engin] really stepped up this weekend and provided great leadership, especially in the title game. They each played the tournament of their lives."

Gonen recorded six points in the championship, and Engin made 46 saves on 66 shots in the tournament. Both players joined Stahl on the Eastern Championship All–Tournament First Team.

J.C. Limardo, somehow left off the All–Tourney team, scored five points in the finale, netting two goals and assisting on three others taking some of the pressure off of super–sniper Stahl.

"I'm proud of the kids; I'm very proud of Stahl," Yarworth said. "[Queens] was literally swinging at him, but he kept his cool. He fought hard.

"I told the guys, 'You lost to [Queens in the North Division playoffs] because you played their game.' This time Queens is the team that lost their head," Yarworth said.

For UMass to get the chance to exact revenge on Queens, the Minutemen first had to get past the No. 18 and No. 12 teams in the nation.

Stahl scored five goals as the Minutemen struggled but managed to get by a resilient No. 18 Slippery Rock

UM wins Atlantic 10

By Casey Kane

PHILADELPHIA — As the final seconds of the Atlantic 10 field hockey tournament championship ticked off the clock, no doubt was left as to why Massachusetts freshman Saskia Fuchs had been chosen as the conference's Rookie of the Year.

UMASS	8
URI	0

Fuchs, who received the award on Friday night, scored four goals in the final game of the tournament on her way to being dubbed the tourney's Most Outstanding Player.

UMASS	2
TEMPLE	0

The top–seeded Minutewomen captured the A–10 title with a 6–0 victory over second–seeded Rhode Island on Sunday after downing Temple 2–0 in the semifinals Saturday afternoon.

UMass, ranked ninth nationally after a 14–5 regular season, now receives and automatic berth in an NCAA play–in game against Mid–America conference winner Ball State, today at 2 p.m. at Westfield State College.

Fuchs led the charge for the Minutewomen in Sunday's contest, notching the game's first goal with 25:15 remaining in the first half.

After carrying the ball into the circle, she worked around a charging URI defender before firing past Lady Ram goalie Jackie Pizzi, on Pizzi's left side. That goal provided the framework for Fuchs' three additional goals as Fuchs would use the set–up to beat Pizzi all afternoon.

"We played our own game, and we created our own opportunities," Fuchs said. "It's not just me, it was the whole team. We played one of our best games."

That fact was again evidenced with 8:01 left before intermission. Fuchs, again, beat Pizzi on the left side after working past the URI defenders and into the circle.

"We watched a video last night and one of the key things was that [Pizzi] really had trouble with exactly where Saskia scored her angles," said UMass coach Pam Hixon, who was honored as A–10 Coach of the Year. "[Saskia] remembered that, and she put herself into position to get a couple of those shots, and when she shot it, it was to the opposite board."

UMass increased its lead with just over a minute left in the half when senior Kyle Rothenberger rocketed the ball off a defender's stick and into the Rhode Island cage on a penalty corner — one of the eight the Minutewomen had on the afternoon.

Fuchs added a second assist in the second half. On another corner situation, she was forced to take an off–line shot, but sophomore Kate Putnam was there to deflect the ball, padding UMass' lead at 4–0 with 18:55 remaining in regulation.

"We dominated that game, start to finish," Rothenberger said. "It was a great win because we suffered that disappointing loss last year [UMass lost to URI 3–2 in last year's semi–finals.]"

Rhode Island, stymied by UMass' first–half offensive output and defensive strategies, which allowed URI only one penalty corner in the game, was silenced by Putnam's goal, allowing Fuchs to take advantage of the disheartened Lady Ram defense.

With 2:10 remaining in the game, and again with 60 seconds left on the clock, Fuchs tallied mirror images of her previous 11 points after adding an assist on Saturday to her points from Sunday.

Massachusetts also tied a record for goals in the tournament with its eight over the weekend and set a new record for goals in the tourney championship.

Minutewoman goalie Hilary Rose — who had guaranteed a UMass title after being chosen as the A–10 Player of the Year during Friday's annual banquet — stopped a pair of URI shots in the game. Rose, whose flawless games tied her own record for shutouts in the tournament, garnered the mark for career shutouts in the A–10 tournament with four.

"You have to be positive for your own team, and it's just hard luck for the rest of the teams because we're going to win [A–10s]," Rose said after her team's semi–final win. "We're the No. 1 seed."

"She took us all very much by surprise when she said that," Hixon said.

Women's soccer lose A–10's; but still claim NCAA

By Jorma Kansanen

KINGSTON, RI — After a bloody skirmish in a 1–0 Atlantic 10 semifinal win over No. 23 George Washington last Friday night, you would think the No. 19 Massachusetts women's soccer team would walk all over Dayton (13–9, 6–1 in A–10) on Championship Sunday. But the only walking the Minutewomen (15–4–1, 7–0–1 in A–10) did Sunday afternoon at the URI Soccer Complex was off the field in defeat, losing to the Flyers 3–2.

UMASS	1

Powered by a team–wide adrenaline push after a score by junior Erica Iverson (season: 5 goals, 4 assists, 14 points) to put UMass up 2–1, Dayton's Renee Harmeyer and Tournament MVP Julie Wilde each scored goals in the last 17 minutes to push Dayton to the A–10 title.

DAYTON	3
UMASS	2

After three consecutive A–10 Championships, and an overall conference record of 18–1–3, the last thing expected to happen was for the Minutewomen to fold in their eminent domain. Without the services of two of their top players, Rebecca Myers (torn ACL) and Erin Lynch (pulled hamstring), and with senior Amy Powell and sophomore Robin Smith banged up from the GW game, UMass witnessed the inconceivable.

But, with their national and regional rankings still intact, UMass was able to achieve the conceivable, and received an NCAA postseason bid on Monday night. This Sunday at 1:00 p.m., UMass will face off with No. 6 Harvard in the first round of the NCAA Tournament. It would have helped if UMass had won the A–10 crown, which would have virtually assured them a first round home game, but the Minutewomen will take the bid with open arms.

Work ethic will have to improve this weekend, and for coach Jim Rudy, he was not pleased with the loss.

"I would say we were outworked, outhustled and outmuscled," Rudy said after the Dayton game. "I think for our kids, we scored much too early, and after that we disappeared. Basically, they outfought us."

The game looked to be UMass' to win, as Dayton lost its starting keeper Damian Gold to injury this week. Then, it appeared that the first goal of the game would propel UMass over the top, but down the line, it hurt their competitive concentration.

Senior Sandy Shimogaki (2g, 5a, 9pts) was sent in on the left flank by a nice feed from freshman Emma Kurowski (12g, 6a, 30 pts), and proceeded to blast a left footed strike past Dayton's substitute keeper Tiffany King to the far corner. The score made it 1–0 at the 6:40 mark of the first half, but the emotional momentum eventually turned to Dayton's favor.

With their first real opportunity at the 19:06 mark on Minutewomen keeper Danielle Dion, junior midfielder Angie Beecroft struck a low, hard shot from the right flank beating Dion to the left, tying the match at 1–1. UMass had two good scoring opportunities off of corners before the end of the half. Iverson, a second team All–Conference and an All–Tournament selection, was able to get off a header that King contained on the first corner, while just missing a diving chance with her right foot on the second corner.

In the second half, Dayton turned up their game to another emotional notch. Junior midfielder Terry Richardson shadowed Kurowski, rendering the offensive side of the 1996 A–10 Rookie of the Year ineffective. When it looked like Dayton's mucking style of play would send both teams into overtime, Iverson came through. With a little over 68 minutes into the match, the defender beat King near post,

Minutemen lose heartbreaker; fall 30–6

By Luke Meredith

WILLIAMSBURG, VA.— It's too bad they don't have a statistic that measures heart.

With hopes of a Yankee Conference title out of reach following last Saturday's loss to Maine, it was gut–check time for the Minutemen, and they responded, holding the conference's second best offense to only six first half points before William and Mary turned it on late, scoring 17 points in the last 7:25 of the game and running away from the Minutemen, 30–6. UMass has now dropped three straight, and fall to 5–5, 3–4 in Yankee Conference play, while William and Mary improves to 8–2. If the Tribe beats Richmond next Saturday, they will win the Yankee Conference title.

"It's a shame the score didn't indicate how we played," senior linebacker Justin Reimer said. "We played with real emotion, we did everything well."

With the score tied at six at halftime, William and Mary broke open the game midway through the third quarter. Tribe sophomore quarterback Mike Cook, who had struggled in the first half, exploded out of the gates, going 3–for–4 for 82 yards, including a 15 yard touchdown strike to Dave Conklin that would prove to be the winning score, giving William and Mary a 13–6 lead.

The Tribe got a 38 yard field goal from Brian Shallcross with 7:25 left in the fourth quarter, pushing their lead to 16–6. William and Mary then put the game away with 3:13 to go, when senior Tim Wercher capped off a five play, 48 yard drive with a nine yard touchdown that gave the Tribe a 23–6 advantage. Following a Jeff Smith interception, his second of the day, Cook rounded out the scoring with a 6 yard TD run.

The Tribe, who came into the game ranked first in the YanCon and fourth nationally in defense, showed why they're ranked so high, holding the Minutemen to just 36 total yards in the second half.

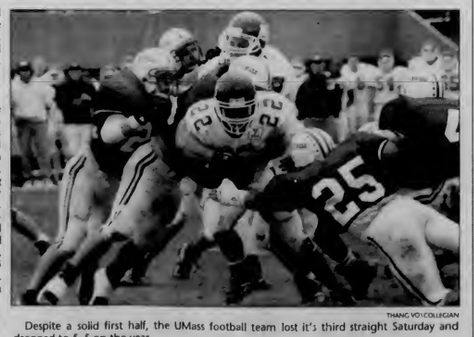
"I'm really proud of these guys, they played like hell," UMass head coach Mike Hodges said. "They played with courage, they played hard, very sound football."



The Minutemen played perhaps their best football of the season in the first half, with a passing attack that finally got untracked. UMass controlled the ball for 17:25, and Smith went wild, going 9–for–15 for 117 yards. After William and Mary kicked two field goals, of 26 and 25 yards, to take a 6–0 lead early in the second half, the Minutemen tied it up with 5:21 to go in the half. Taking 5:36, the Minutemen drove 67 yards in 13 plays, and Smith punched it in with a three yard touchdown run, tying the game at six. Matt Murphy's extra point attempt was blocked.

The Minutemen had a chance to take the lead before halftime. Following a Tribe fumble at the Massachusetts 28 yard line with 2:32 left in the half, Smith led the Minutemen down to the William and Mary 11 yard line, but Matt Murphy's field goal attempt was blocked, and UMass went into the locker room tied at six.

William and Mary head coach Jimmye Laycock, who has seen his team go down the last two years to the Minutemen, was concerned that UMass was at it again.

"It's very easy to panic," Laycock said. "Going into the half at 6–6, I was thinking that maybe they do have our

In the Pulp Fiction knock–off, Two Days in the Valley, that hit theaters a couple months ago, the main character frequently reminded the viewers of how the entire world can come crashing down in just one minute.

The Massachusetts hockey team (1–5, 1–5 Hockey East) played a powerful New Hampshire (5–2, 4–0) team tough Saturday night at the William D. Mullins Center, but eventually succumbed 5–4 in overtime, their hard–work erased by a 53–second span in the second period, where UNH pumped in three goals.

UNH	5
UMASS	4

The loss came on the heels of a 1–0 decision taken by UNH on Friday at Mullins. The Wildcats outshot UMass 41– 19 in a contest where Rich Moriarty's fine work in the UMass net kept the score from reaching tour proportions.

UNH certainly enjoyed its two days in the valley, while a regrouping UMass is more than pleased to see a home–and– home series with Merrimack on the agenda for this weekend. UMass won all three of its meetings with the Warriors a year ago.

"[Friday's game] was a tough loss but [Saturday's] was a little tougher because at times we out played them," UMass coach Joe Mallen said. "We had a mental lapse in the second, but I've still got to give our guys credit. They battled and came back to tie it up and showed a lot of courage and heart."

Saturday's contest opened innocently enough, with each team scoring a goal through 25 minutes of play. UNH opened the scoring 1:25 into the contest when Derek Bekar was left untouched on the doorstep, and redirected a Mark Mowers pass from the far–side boards.

Meanwhile, Brian Regan, making his first start in goal for UMass since being blasted at Boston University on Nov. 1, looked sharp early, making a tremendous glove save on a backhand shot by Eric Nickulas.

Gerry Cahill evened the score 2:12 into the second period, converting after a Judd Smith wrap–around.

At this point the UMass defense decided to take its Veterans' Day break, as Regan was left helpless in his crease for a UNH blitzing. At the 5:42 mark, Mowers drew first blood, redirecting a feed by Steve O'Brien through both a crowd in front and Regan.

Nickulas, untouched in the slot, one–timed a pass from Jason Krog from behind the net for a 3–1 UNH lead at 6:10, that became a 4–1 edge 25 seconds later when Tom Nolan fired a backhander into the top shelf from 20 feet out. This goal and pin–point accuracy shot is destined to end up on UNH's highlight reel at its April banquet.

Mallen quickly used his time out after the potential back– breaker and refocused his troops. Trailing 4–1 after the end of the second, the Minutemen pieced together a tremendous third period where they more and simply hung in the game.

"In between periods I tried not to take the traditional approach," Mallen said. "I just said that if they can score three there's no reason

DEANS LIST

Spring Semester 1996

One of the University's highest priorities is its commitment to provide opportunities for academic growth. I am pleased, therefore, to recognize those of you who earned Deans List status for the Spring Semester 1996.

This level of achievement ~ 3.5 or higher semester average with twelve or more graded credits ~ is attained by fewer than 20% of the undergraduate student body. Such outstanding performance is a source of pride to the faculty, staff, your student colleagues, and, of course, your parents.

Thank you for the credit you bring to the University through your achievement.

David K. Scott, Chancellor

PRESS RELEASES

To publicize your achievement, the University News Office will issue a press release to your hometown newspaper, if you are a Massachusetts resident. Out of state students are requested to pick up a press release form at room 200 on the second floor of Munson Hall. For further information, please call the University News Office at 545-0444.

DEANS LIST ADDITIONS/OMISSIONS

The Spring Semester 1996 Deans List is based on grades received and recorded by the Registrar's Office as of October 1, 1996. If you are not on the Deans List and believe you now qualify because one of your grades, an "incomplete" or missing/incorrect grade, was changed after that date, please come to the Registrar's Office, room 213 Whitmore Administration Building for further information. Only graded credits are calculated in determining Deans List eligibility; pass/fail credits are not included.

As a service to the campus community, the Registrar's Office prepares and publishes the Deans List.

North Korea not interested in talks

SEOUL, South Korea (AP) — Angered by a U.S. demand that it apologize for its recent submarine mission to South Korea, North Korea threatened Monday to stay out of proposed four-way talks on bringing peace to divided Korea.

In April, President Clinton and South Korean President Kim Young-sam proposed talks in which the two Koreas would discuss officially ending their 1950-53 Korean War with a peace treaty. Washington and Beijing would sit in as mediators.

North Korea held back, demanding a detailed explanation by the U.S. government. Washington has been negotiating with Pyongyang on allowing South Korea to join in the briefing.

But the negotiations hit a snag when the North Korean submarine was found grounded off South Korea's east coast, straining already tense relations.

U.S. officials, including Ambassador James T. Laney, have said there would be no further peace overtures, including the planned briefing, until North Korea apologizes for the sub's incursion. North Korea is "compelled to interpret this as a revocation of the four-way talks," a North Korean Foreign Ministry spokesman told Pyongyang's official Korean Central News Agency.

"We have not had much interest in the proposed four-way talks, the content and purpose of which are obscure, still less pinned any hope on them," the unidentified spokesman said.

Man in bunny suit quests for arts degree

MIDDLETOWN, Conn. (AP) — Ehhhhhhhh, whaddya mean a hare-brained idea? Made ya smile, didn't it?

Steve Broido, a theater major at Wesleyan University, spent five days last week walking around campus in a big, furry, blue bunny suit to study the actor's dilemma of having to submerge one's personality in the character's.

For his senior project, Broido wore the costume to classes and meals, taking it off only when he was alone. He even dressed up for late-night trips to the bathroom.

"I tried to put myself on the line while being protected by a huge, false persona," Broido said. "I was locked in the suit, but people were paying attention to the bunny."

Jeremy Bernstein, one of Broido's roommates, said even though he knew what his friend was doing, he still got an occasional shock.

"I did do a double take at 4 a.m. when I saw the big, blue bunny slicing my birthday cake," Bernstein said. "It was fun and hard for him, but I'll miss that permanently smiling face."

Possible 351 people killed as two airliners collide in India

By Krishnan Guruswamy
Associated Press

CHARKHI DADRI, India — A Saudi jumbo jet climbing from New Delhi's airport collided with a Kazak plane coming in for landing yesterday, creating twin fireballs that turned the sky red as dawn and scattered the bodies of up to 351 people over farmland below. If the death toll is confirmed, the crash would be the third-deadliest in aviation history.

Wreckage dropping from the sky gouged big craters and left body parts, baggage and clothes strewn across six miles of wheat and mustard fields near the town of Charkhi Dadri, about 60 miles west of New Delhi. The first people to arrive at the scene said the dusk air was filled with an unbearable stench of burning flesh.

"I saw 60 or 70 bodies, but only about 15 were identifiable," said Manjit Singh, a 19-year-old college student who sped to the site on his motorcycle after seeing the collision from his home. The faces of the rest of the victims were horribly disfigured and charred, he said.

Rescue vehicles tried to navigate the area's poor roads, arriving at the crash site after the first curious villagers. Within a few hours, thousands of people gathered in the dark and solemnly watched the search.

"We have collected 200 bodies so far from all over the field," said Mohammed Akhil, the police officer in charge of the operations.

The Saudi Arabia-bound Saudia jetliner with 312 passengers and crew members had been in the air for only seven minutes when it collided with a Kazakstan Airlines Ilyushin-76 cargo plane, which was on a landing approach, aviation officials said.

Seventeen foreigners were on board the Saudi jetliner, including two Americans and a Briton, Press Trust of India news agency reported.

The plane arriving from Shymkent in the former Soviet republic of Kazakstan was carrying 39 people — 28 Kazak passengers and an 11-member Russian crew.

All aboard the two planes were believed to be killed. There were no reports that anyone on the ground died.

Hours after the crash, the crumpled fuselage of the Kazak plane rested in a field. The jet's wings had been sliced off. A few charred bodies lay on the ground.

Local district administrator T.V.S.L. Prasad said workers were trying to extricate bodies from the plane.

The American pilot of a C-141 Air Force transport plane who was bringing in supplies for the U.S. Embassy in New Delhi witnessed the crash's fiery aftermath from 20,000 feet.

"We noticed out of our right-hand (side of the plane) a large cloud lit up with an orange glow, from within the clouds," the 30-year-old captain told reporters in a conference call from the Indian capital.

"The glow intensity of the cloud became dimmer and the two fireballs descended and became fireballs on the ground," said the pilot, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The total number of passengers and crew members was reported by the local news agency, which quoted civil aviation authorities, and was confirmed for The Associated Press by an airport police official.

The U.S. Embassy could not confirm that two Americans were on board; the British Foreign office said one of its citizens was believed killed.

Nine Nepalese, three Pakistanis, a Bangladeshi and a Saudi were also on the Saudi plane, which had taken off from New Delhi's Indira Gandhi International Airport.

The Indian government announced a judicial inquiry into the cause of the accident.

The weather in New Delhi was normal for this time of year. The skies were clear, albeit polluted. Smoke from fireworks set off in recent days to celebrate the Hindu holiday of Diwali had thickened the haze.

At about 6:40 p.m. local time, as the sun was setting, the Saudi plane was cleared to climb to 14,000 feet, while the Kazak aircraft was authorized to descend to 15,000 feet, said H.S. Khola, the director general of civil aviation. Suddenly, he said at a news conference, "the radar blip of both aircraft was lost."

Yesterday's crash appears to be the third-deadliest air accident ever.

In 1977, two Boeing 747s operated by Pan American and KLM collided at the airport on Tenerife in Spain's Canary Islands, killing 582 people. In 1985, a Japan Air Lines Boeing 747 crashed into a mountain on a domestic flight, killing 520.

Until yesterday's crash, the third-deadliest crash was a 1974 accident outside Paris involving a Turkish DC-10 that killed 346 people.

New library director looks forward to 2000

By Jonathan Liberty
Collegian Staff

A new Director of Libraries at the University of Massachusetts, Margaret Crist, was announced Thursday at Faculty Senate by Provost Patricia Crosson.

"Ms. Crist will be a powerful force in the future of our library and the campus and I am confident that under her leadership, we will be proud of the W.E.B. Du Bois library for years to come. I look forward to working with her," Crosson said.

In a press release Crist said, "I am delighted to be accepting this position to lead the library at a time when the campus is clearly moving forward with an exciting and challenging agenda for the future.

"I look forward to working with the faculty, students, library staff and campus administration in making the library a full partner in shaping that future," added Crist.

As Director of Libraries, Crist will be responsible for providing leadership and vision for the University's library system, which consists of the W.E.B. Du Bois Library and three branch libraries.

The libraries, which have an annual budget of about $10 million, employ 143 permanent staff and house a collection of five million books, periodicals and government documents, 15,500 current serial subscriptions and significant special collections, notably the W.E.B Du Bois papers.

Dr. Norman D. Aitken, co-chair of the director of libraries search committee, wrote in the Director of Libraries' job description, "The successful candidate will be able to plan and develop the library of the future in order to provide the information services necessary to support the teaching and research missions of the University."

Crist will oversee the ongoing development of integrated computer systems and determine the proper balance of electronic information sources and print material.

She will also serve on the University's Council of Deans and Academic Officers, and will chair the Library's Executive Committee and Administrative Council.

Crist currently works as the Assistant Director for Public Services at the University of Michigan, where she earned a masters in library science.

Over the past six years at the University of Michigan, Crist has been responsible for the creation of the knowledge navigation student, which provides a place for faculty, students and staff to learn how to use the technology that is shaping the future of library information retrieval.

Also, she oversaw the expansion of the M-Link Project, a University of Michigan-based effort to provide extended reference service and electronic resources to all public libraries in the state.

Before working at the University of Michigan, Crist spent 20 years at the Boston Public Library and the Central Massachusetts Regional Library System.

Crist will succeed Richard Talbot, who will be retiring on Dec. 31 after 26 years of service.

She will serve as an advocate and spokesperson for the library, both on and off campus, articulating the library's goals and requirements.

Boltwood Project to sponsor 5K

By Daniel E. Levenson & Raghuram Vadarevu
Collegian Staff

A five kilometer foot race to benefit children and mentally challenged adults will be held this Saturday at the University of Massachusetts.

"In past experiences, races are a really good way for fund- raising. [The race] will generate a lot of interest in the [Boltwood Project]," said Mike Mckechnie, race coordinator for the Boltwood Project.

According to Mckechnie, the race, organized by the Boltwood Project, will start at Hills Building and will go to Health Services and past lower Central Residential Area.

The race will continue onto Stockbridge Road, down to the Silvio O. Conte Polymer Research Center. From there the race will go up to Thatcher Way and towards the Chancellor's House, said Mckechnie.

From the Chancellor's House, the race will go past Orchard Hill and upper Central and down to the finish line at Hills, said Mckechnie.

According to Mckechnie, they have registered approximately 25 people for the race thus far and are looking for more registrants.

Registration will continue until the day of the race. The cost of registration is $15.

Mckechnie said the runners will be divided into four age- based divisions; 18 and under, 19-29, 30-39 and 40 and over. The top finishers in each of the four age groups will be given medals.

"The Boltwood project is an opportunity for university and five-college students to make a positive impact on our community and neighboring towns," Jeffrey Chapdelaine.

According to the press release, various other prizes will be given to randomly picked runners participating during the race. Prizes include four gift certificates from Bicycle World, a Sunday brunch at the Lord Jeffery Inn and calendars from Runners World magazine.

The Boltwood Project is a community service program that serves Amherst and surrounding communities.

The project is a service learning organization offering students up to two credits for their volunteer work. It will be having a recruiting drive in January.

Jeffrey Chapdelaine, head coordinator of the Boltwood Project, said the group has been doing well this semester.

He added, "Boltwood is working hard to give something back to the community.

"The Boltwood project is an opportunity for University and five-college students to make a positive impact on our community and neighboring towns," Chapdelaine said.

"It is definitely a worthwhile program to get into because you feel like you have done something good for the community," said Mckechnie, a supervisor for one of the project's volunteer groups working with mentally challenged adults.

The Project will have a table on the campus center concourse for runner registration until Thursday.

It has UMass student participants from every class and throughout a wide variety of University departments.

"We definitely represent every school and college," Chapdelaine said.

Dengue fever kills in S.E.A.

INDONESIA (AP) — Dengue fever reportedly has killed 156 people and infected more than 7,200 others this year in Indonesia, and an outbreak of the mosquito-borne disease has claimed 34 lives in Vietnam's Mekong delta.

Indonesia's official Antara news agency reported Monday on dengue fever in Central Java province.

It quoted Slamet Haryanto, head of the regional health office, as saying the government was moving to check dengue fever and prevent more deaths.

The Vietnamese Health Ministry said that in addition to the 34 deaths, more than 8,000 people in Vietnam have contracted dengue fever this year.

The ministry, in a report carried Monday in the English-language Vietnam News, said most of those who died were children.

Symptoms of dengue fever, which is carried by mosquitoes, include high fever and nose bleeds.

In severe cases, patients suffer hemorrhaging of internal organs.

In Burma, the Philippines, Indonesia and Thailand last year, more than 400,000 people got dengue fever, and 8,000 died, the World Health Organization estimates.

Dengue fever is controlled by killing mosquitoes and destroying their breeding places.

E. coli breakout calls for new rules

By Lauran Neergaard
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Alarmed by another E. coli bacteria outbreak that killed a child and sickened dozens of others in Western states, the government is considering forcing all apple juices — and possibly other fruit juices — to be pasteurized.

Also under debate are measures such as chemically washing fresh produce or forcing manufacturers to adopt programs that prove foods stay pure from harvest to dinner table.

The deliberations come after at least 49 people, mostly children, were sickened from E. coli in trendy, unpasteurized fruit juices. One child died Friday in Denver.

Once thought a threat only in undercooked meat, the virulent E. coli O157 strain now has surfaced repeatedly in apple cider and even in lettuce.

But health experts weren't alarmed until two weeks ago when Odwalla Inc., based in Half Moon Bay, Calif., recalled its gourmet juices that contained tainted apple juice. That outbreak showed that even large companies known for quality are vulnerable.

"The number of outbreaks are significant in the past year," said John Vanderveen of the Food and Drug Administration. But "there's no doubt this is a different problem this time." Just hours after the recall began, he called a special meeting to warn apple juice makers "to ratchet up their quality control" while the government decides the next step.

Meanwhile, Vanderveen is advising parents of young children and people with weak immune systems, who are most at risk from foodborne illnesses, to buy only pasteurized juices. Unpasteurized ones, a minority on the market, must be sold cold, so shoppers should check the label when buying any chilled juice, he added. Many people say unpasteurized juices taste better. But pasteurization, a heating process, kills E. coli, while simply washing fruit with water doesn't.

If the FDA mandates pasteurization, the rule could apply both to the upscale, all-natural juices sold in supermarkets and perhaps even to the cider farmers sell at tiny roadside stands.

Although the government is looking first at apple products, they're not the only threat. Salmonella has poisoned Americans who ate alfalfa sprouts, cantaloupes, watermelon and unpasteurized orange juice. Guatemalan raspberries are the prime suspect in last summer's outbreak of the parasite cyclospora.

At least four U.S. outbreaks of E. coli O157, a particularly dangerous strain discovered in 1982, were linked to raw lettuce in the past year. Last month, it sickened 10 people who drank apple cider in Connecticut.

While bacterial outbreaks are increasing, so is Americans' consumption of all-natural foods - an industry growing about 25 percent a year.

People don't understand that fresh or natural "doesn't necessarily mean better for you," said Dr. Mitchell Cohen, bacterial diseases chief at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. One worry: Organic foods often are fertilized with cow manure even though E. coli flourishes in cattle.

When the Odwalla outbreak hit, the Clinton administration already was planning a broader initiative to better safeguard all foods. One step is expected to be an expansion of the nation's fledgling early-warning system for foodborne risks, which now operates in just five states.

But the latest E. coli outbreak has the FDA considering what steps fresh food makers should take immediately. Options include experimental chemical washes that promise to purify produce, additives that might kill the bacteria or pasteurization.

"You're going to have a tremendous outcry of individuals" if the FDA mandates pasteurization, warned Cornell University food scientist Bob Gravani. "The unique flavors will not be there, but that's the price you pay for safety."

The government also could require the natural food industry to adopt strict quality-control programs similar to ones now mandated for seafood and meat companies. These force firms to prevent contamination at every step of production, from harvesting the food to selling it.

Ousted Bhutto to face corruption charges

By Donna Bryson
Associated Press

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — Ousted Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto will face corruption charges that could result in her being banned from running in new elections scheduled for February, her successor said Sunday.

Interim Prime Minister Miraj Khalid told reporters he would soon appoint a corruption committee to investigate politicians, including Ms. Bhutto and her husband, ousted Investment Minister Asif Ali Zardari.

Details of how his corruption committee would operate — including whether its judgments and banning orders could be appealed - had not yet been worked out.

But Ms. Bhutto faces "all sorts of charges," Khalid said. Charges will also be filed against Zardari, who has been detained since last Tuesday, he said.

President Farooq Leghari dismissed Ms. Bhutto on Tuesday, accusing her of sanctioning police hit squads, allowing corruption to run rampant and undermining the judicial system.

Khalid was appointed caretaker prime minister and new elections were set for Feb. 3, nearly two years before Ms. Bhutto's term was to have expired.

As an appointed prime minister, Khalid's only mandate is public anger at the perception that Ms. Bhutto allowed her ministers to steal from the treasury, appointed friends and relatives to mismanage government departments, and did not hesitate to use violence to protect her position.

Addressing a news conference Sunday, he said Pakistanis could be assured his government would be more accountable because of his integrity and lifelong reputation as "a crusader for democratic rights."

He pledged elections would not be delayed, though it was unclear how he could make preparations - including conducting a census and establishing the corruption commission - in such a short time.

Ms. Bhutto's is the fourth Pakistani government to find its term abruptly cut short. Though few in Pakistan have defended her record, some have questioned why leaders once again resorted to dissolving a government and appointing caretakers, rather than using the courts or parliamentary procedure to check her powers.

The independent Human Rights Commission last week called for the repeal of the constitutional provision under which Ms. Bhutto's government was dissolved,

The army has ruled Pakistan for 25 years of its 49-year history. Ms. Bhutto first came to power in 1988, after military dictator Mohammed Zia-ul Haq died in a suspicious plane crash.

Her first government was also dismissed amid charges of corruption, and she orchestrated street protest that culminated with a 1993 election victory.

She has vowed to fight her latest dismissal in court. She also had challenged her husband's detention under security laws that allow him to be held up to three months without charge.

PRINCIPLES of SOUND RETIREMENT INVESTING

IRONICALLY, THE TIME TO START SAVING FOR RETIREMENT IS WHEN IT LOOKS LIKE YOU CAN LEAST AFFORD IT.

Can't afford to save for retirement? The truth is, you can't afford not to. Not when you realize that your retirement can last 20 to 30 years or more. You'll want to live at least as comfortably then as you do now. And that takes planning.

By starting to save now, you can take advantage of tax deferral and give your money time to compound and grow. Consider this: Set aside just $100 each month beginning at age 30 and you can accumulate over $172,109* by the time you reach age 65. But wait ten years and you'll have to budget $219 each month to reach the same goal.

Even if you're not counting the years to retirement, you can count on TIAA-CREF to help you build the future you deserve – with flexible retirement and tax-deferred annuity plans, a diverse portfolio of investment choices, and a record of personal service that spans 75 years.

President Clinton's electoral

Martin F. Jones

"Hopefully, by the will of God, we'll be able to do it again.' — Boxer Mike Tyson, referring to a likely rematch following his defeat by Evander Holyfield.

Hello, true believers. You are now reading the great words of your guiding light into the next millennium, Martin F. Jones, the Millennial Prophet. Today I am pleased to announce that our distinguished President of the United States has yet to be re-elected, and those of you who were hoping for his early retirement will have another chance to send him on his way back to Arkansas. Yes, a rematch of the 1996 election will be scheduled very soon, and America will go to the polls once again to pick our next president.

Okay. I know what you're thinking. This kid will never quit. I can see it now appearing in medical journals: The Martin Jones Syndrome, defined as a symptomatic and obsessive belief that the impossible eventually will happen. You probably are wondering if I'll still be making these predictions in January as President Clinton is being inaugurated into a second term of office. Well I promise you that as of noon on Jan. 20, 1997, I will cease all predictions in regard to this election. However, until then, in the words of the legendary Yogi Berra, "It ain't over 'till it's over!"

So how will this seemingly impossible scenario take place? Well, stay tuned my friends. You are about to bear witness to the revelation of a great prophetic vision.

To start off, I'd like to explain how my gift of second sight took place. Following a near-fatal car accident enroute to last year's Million Man March, I began to see vivid depictions of the future. These visions centered around the prospect of Massachusetts governor William Weld running for president in 1996 against President Bill Clinton. I can assure you that this indeed will occur. Here is how this event will develop and transpire according to my premonitions.

On Friday, Nov. 15, 1996, the Republican National Committee will nominate Governor William F. Weld of Massachusetts for vice-president of the United States by acclamation. This will happen as a result of the untimely loss of the previous V.P. nominee, Mr. Jack F. Kemp. Because the electoral college will not meet until December to officially cast its votes for president, Governor Weld will volunteer to step up to the plate in Mr. Kemp's absence on the GOP ballot. However, in order to maintain the democratic integrity of such a major change in the GOP ticket, a new nationwide special election will be scheduled on November 21 so that the people's voice is properly represented on the new GOP ballot. Because of the influence a running mate can have on either ticket, all four candidates will appear on the ballots of Clinton–Dole II.

But it is on Saturday, November 16 that the most dramatic event of all will occur. It would not be prudent to mention it specifically in this column, but I will skip on to outline for you the outcome of this historic event.

On Thursday, November 21, Governor Weld will announce his candidacy for president with 30 days remaining before the second presidential election takes place. (It will be postponed for 30 days until December 21.) Weld will pursue the GOP nomination for president in a brokered convention to be held at the FleetCenter in Boston on December 2–5. Former GOP presidential candidate Patrick Buchanan will challenge Weld for the nomination. Weld will defeat Buchanan, and will name New Jersey Governor Christine Todd Whitman as his running mate.

During the fourth week of November, New Jersey senator Bill Bradley will become the next vice–president of the United States and will run against Governor Whitman on the new Clinton–Bradley ticket. There will be three debates, all of which will include Ross Perot and his new running mate, former Connecticut governor Lowell Weicker. The first debate will be a presidential debate which will take place on December 11. The second debate will be a vice–presidential debate which will take place on December 15. The third and final debate will be a presidential debate on December 18.

On Saturday, Dec. 21, 1996, the American people will turn out in an historically high turnout to elect the next president of the United States. Unfortunately, in a three–way race between Clinton, Weld and Perot, none of these three candidates will secure the required 270 electoral votes to win the White House, and the House of Representatives will elect the next president after the 105th Congress convenes in January. Amazingly, the GOP–led congress actually votes for Clinton in a show of bi–partisan unity, acknowledging that as he and Weld are ideologically identical, and Ross Perot is out of the question, Clinton deserves as second term in office as the most qualified and experienced of the three candidates.

Soon after he's reelected, Clinton names Retired General Colin L. Powell as his new Secretary of State, and Senator John F. Kerry to head the department of Veterans Affairs. And there will be few surprises when UMass president William M. Bulger leaves UMass to become Massachusetts' next U.S. senator after running in a successful campaign for Kerry's open senate seat next spring.

So there you have it folks. This is an authentic prophetic vision of the final outcome of the 1996 election. I can assure you that this vision will indeed come true. I can see it crystal clear, and soon, you will see it too.

Question one traps the voters

Shannon Daly

I've always liked the phrase, "Perspective: use it or lose it."

Apparently, the majority of Massachusetts voters weren't using it when they passed the referendum question on our ballot this year — yes, the infamous Question 1.

I have a few quick questions for those of you out there who voted "yes":

• Do you realize that the Fisheries and Wildlife Board now has the potential to deteriorate into a Wildlife Mismanagement Task Force?

• Did you know that part of the bill you just helped pass included redundant sections attempting to outlaw a practice that has already been illegal since 1970? (Apparently drawn up by someone who didn't do all their homework ...

• Just what is your definition of the word "cruel," as in, say "Ban 'cruel' traps?"

I'm hoping that these questions got the "yessers" thinking. Now I'd like to explain why these questions are vital to an understanding of the effects the passing of the bill will have on all of us.

• There are no longer any restrictions as to who may serve of the seven member Fisheries and Wildlife Board of Massachusetts. Before, five members needed to represent hunting and fishing interests, one spot was reserved for a wildlife biologist and one for any citizen with an interest in the issues. Well, the animal rights activists are getting psyched, because now they can work on getting members appointed, to speak for our voiceless woodland friends against the big, bad hunters.

But do you know who else is psyched? Land–developing companies, for one, because that darned bunch of hunters/ conservationists (believe it or not, the two go hand in hand) that make up the Board has been using such a big chunk of its budget to buy up land for preservation. Land that could have been developed on, for Pete's sake! Now the said companies have a chance to put an end to that pesky problem!

Ugh, oh. Looks like the joke is on you, animal rights activists. Because now the Board is going to become a loaded political cannon, with no guarantees that the interests of wildlife and conservation are going to be addressed.

Would it matter if I mentioned that the Board is funded solely through the sale of hunting and fishing and trapping licenses, taxes on ammunition, guns, etc.? It's just something to think about.

• Hey — it's illegal for hunters to bait and lure bears. Again. The authors of the bill must not have realized that this practice has been outlawed for 25 years. Kudos to these people — way to be effective! It's also (newly) illegal to hunt with dogs, which will make it harder to take bears — some of which may be problem bears. I heard horror stories about dogs driving bear cubs away from their mothers and then ripping the defenseless babies to shreds. Reality check: first, hunters were legally bound to train and control their dogs and were not allowed to hunt cubs and mothers anyway.

Second, bears will tree themselves before they allow themselves to be ripped to shreds. Finally, mother bears don't leave their cubs. If you think that's not true, I encourage you to go find a bear family and try to separate them. Be sure to let us know how it turns out.

• According to the Q1 advocates, we have now effectively banned all "cruel" traps, meaning all padded body–gripping traps. (Steel–jaw ones with teeth were already gone.) Now the animals are going to be taken in extremely "humane" box traps. When the animals become enclosed in these, they panic and stress and slowly go mad with fear, and some of them actually die of sheer terror within hours. It's mentally comparable to the discomfort and anguish they experience physically when caught in a leg hold trap. Don't think I'm speculating. This is documented fact. But hey, at least we got rid of all those "cruel" traps. Phew.

Just another aside: box traps are much less effective at catching animals whose population need to be kept under strict control, in order that they do not cause a safety / annoyance problem for humans and a health problem for themselves (key words: starvation and disease). We're going to have a serious problem on our hands in a few years. Maybe we can hold the "yessers" accountable for their votes, and have them foot the public and private property damage and health bills that are going to start accumulating?

I am disappointed with the way the Q1 campaign was carried out. Too bad no RSO's on campus had the balls to take a "No" stance and give people a chance to hear both sides of the issue. Too bad the Animal Rights Coalition (who are a great bunch of well–intentioned students who generally have my full support and applause) irresponsibly displayed "Ban cruel traps: Vote yes on 1" signs, along with pictures of three–legged dogs who allegedly lost a limb to the evil leg–hold traps.

I guess pet–owner responsibility should go right out the window, along with trapper's rights. Pet owners should have been angry when they let their beloveds go roaming onto state land where trapping was permitted, and the poor animals got trapped. The trappers should have been thinking that Sparky might decide to take a walk over his trapping route. Just like if you live on or near a busy street, drivers should logically refrain from actually driving past your house, because Sparky might decide to dart across the street that day. It's not your fault, pet owners! It's the drivers' responsibility to be constantly thinking about your uncontrolled pets!

In addition to my disappointment in the ARC, I am upset with the media coverage. While the paper focused on many of the election candidates in detail, an article of the debate surrounding Q1 didn't appear until election day, in at least one case. I'm pretty sure that might have been too late to educate people.

But I'm mostly disappointed in the voters who didn't take the time to educate themselves about this question, or for doing so and losing that all–important element: perspective.

My facts are checked, my logic is sound. I invite anyone to challenge me on the issues I've raised here. Thanks, and I'll see y'all in a few years when there is a referendum question to overturn this disaster. Just remember: use it or lose it.

To have and to hold

Amy Lounsbury

"Till death do us part." These words send a chill down my spine each time I hear them. The idea of marriage is such a powerful and beautiful thing to me.

My parents have been married for 31 years today. For 11,315 days they have gone to sleep knowing that they have each other. They have stood side by side through both the good and the bad times. They have worked together to raise a family with a strong set of values and a great deal of love.

Ever since I was a child I have dreamed of my wedding day. It will be in early December, close enough to Christmas to be able to play the music, but not so close as to interfere with my holiday preparations. I know what my dress will look like and what my bridesmaids will wear. I even know who my bridesmaids will be. Only one small detail has been left out. My husband.

It is hard enough to find someone you want to date, let alone someone you want to marry. Many people these days get married much too hastily. Often these marriages end in divorce. I intend to hold out for something that will last forever.

When we are older I want people to look at my husband and me and smile enviously. "Look how happy they are after all these years," strangers will exclaim as they see us walking hand in hand down the street. I want every day to be an adventure and I want a love that will never grow old. I want a lifetime full of laughter, and I want to spend it with not only a husband, but a friend.

Out of the millions of people in the world, choosing one person to spend the rest of your life with is no small decision. The odds of finding someone who also wants to share their life with you seems next to impossible. Yet it happens all the time. Sometimes couples makes the right decision, sometimes they make the wrong decision. Many marriages end in divorce, many stay intact but only do so for the sake of the children, many become on–again, off– again relationships. But many marriages remain true to what they are supposed to be... a joining of two souls who were destined for each other; a friendship which allows for a trust and devotion that cannot be matched elsewhere.

The concept of marriage is very sacred to me. What a wonderful feeling it must be to know that someone loves you, is there for you, not because they have to, but because they want to; that you can go to bed knowing it will not all end tomorrow, that this is truly forever.

There comes a point in a marriage where you suddenly realize that you have been married longer than you were ever single. You evaluate your life and wonder what it would be without your spouse. You realize how much richer your life has become since you said your vows. This is the kind of relationship I will have someday. I will never settle for anything but the real thing. Sure, he may be rich, but can he make me smile when no one else can? Can he understand what I'm thinking before I say a word?

When trying to think of something I could give my parents for their anniversary, I realized it was a hopeless task. A photo album of family pictures? Already been done. A night out to dinner? Nah. Everything seems pointless. Nothing I come up with could ever top the gift they have already given each other — a lifetime full of love, laughter and most importantly, friendship.

The cost of war

Sam McAfee

The celebration of Veteran's Day flooded the mainstream press with war–torn tales of sacrifice in making this country what it is today. Unfortunately, there was not much lip service given to the function of the military, or to what those sacrifices actually helped to achieve.

The U.S. military is the most powerful in world. We spend more on the Pentagon than the next top 10 military spenders combined. We have both the first and third largest airforces in the world (USAF and Navy AF) and pay for the second which is run by Israel.

It could be argued that such was necessary before the fall of the Soviet Union, though I personally think the Pentagon grossly overestimated the size of the Soviet threat to justify further spending on the military (much like the image of Hussein's million man army marching into Saudi Arabia). But even if it was acceptable then, it is no longer possible to maintain such a fallacy.

Perhaps we should examine more closely the function of the U.S. military in assessing the sacrifices of our soldiers. Throughout the history of its development, the United States has used its might to affect political and economic outcomes all over the world. Typically hailed as a protector of democracy, the United States' actions are interested in such a goal when we invaded the Dominican Republic in 1964 to help the military regime oust a democratically elected Juan Bosch.

Nor were we so inclined in Grenada in 1983, when Reagan ordered troops to slaughter people working on an airport intended to bring tourism to the region. The United States' position on Cuba has been pushed mostly by executives at ITT and United Fruit Co., who lost the ability to exploit Cuban peasants in 1959, and encouraged by land owning elite Cuban nationals, who have pushed for a return to Cuban aristocracy where the majority slave for the few.

What is just as saddening as the loss of lives by peoples in the Third World desperately resisting capitalist expansion and imperialism, is the plight of the working class American soldier who has been convinced he is fighting for justice. Instead he is fighting for Wall Street. How many of our workers must die in the quest for corporate profits.

Between 1965 and 1975, the United States lost tens of thousands of young men, carpet bombed Laos, Cambodia, and Vietnam into the stone age and killed millions of Vietnamese starving and poverty–stricken. The United States could not compete for its interests in the Vietnamese economy politically, when Ho Chi Minh, after beating the French imperialists, had the support of over 85 percent of the population. The only other way to clear the way for capitalist development was to accuse the movement of being communist, for which there is no evidence, and intervene militarily. Look where it got us.

And so the United States marches on, opening markets for investors, and brutally repressing popular resistance to this crusade. At the same time as policies push welfare mothers to be self sufficient, and students to pay for their own overpriced education, the government offers tax breaks for the wealthy and military enforcement of U.S. economic interests abroad, regardless of the impact on local populations. On this day of remembrance, it is time to re– examine our role in this changing world and time to rearrange our priorities.

Thoughts for the week

Henry J. Brier

Okay. Because it briefly snowed here Veterans' Day, effectively putting to rest the fall, I have very nearly recovered from that harrowing image from late October.

Directly behind a New York State Trooper seated atop a horse gallivanting around Yankee Stadium was New York Yankee Wade Boggs, flaunting an exuberant smile and enjoying the crown he helped the Boston Red Sox almost win in 1986.

Since 1918, Sox fans have patiently awaited an opportunity that the Yankees have repeatedly achieved.

What's next? Another Stanley Cup for the New York Rangers?

It's very likely for a team sporting both Mark Messier and Wayne Gretzky.

"The hippies are going to beat you up," exclaimed the lovely young lady with the curly brown hair and the dark brown eyes earlier this semester toward September's end.

I didn't even know that there still existed real "hippies," so this was the least of my problems.

Friends used to grumble about the disarray left on "Hippie Beach," and I figured I'd turn this into a column attempting to politicize seemingly impassive surroundings on campus.

Shortly thereafter, I heard a story about someone who cut out the column, pinned it to a cork board and drove a knife through the picture.

Someone else told me that I "persecuted hippies."

Yup. Enrique de Torquemada would be me. You bet.

To think that the written word can evoke so heated a response.

Some years back, Paula Abdul sang about how "opposites attract," and as much as I've racked my brain I cannot seem to cite any musical example of what happens when opposites clash.

Anyway, one day last week I was passing through the Student Union when I bumped into and chatted with a true gentleman on this campus.

This well–spoken, genuinely kind and thought–provoking individual was offering well–rounded advice after having listened acutely to my question, while the hustle and bustle was ongoing around us.

Then, out of the corner of my eye I happened to notice walking toward us, someone who is everything that this adviser is not, and I was momentarily struck by how ironic it was that two completely contradictory individuals were right there.

But, after begrudgingly nodding his head, the acquaintance continued on his way, and we resumed speaking.

"Well, it could take a month, or it could take two months, or maybe in three months when you're running, it may be sore," the family practitioner at University Health Services (UHS) responded over the phone.

Neither is this intended to be a direct hit upon UHS, nor is it an effort to influence a stream of complaints. Actually, I'm rather satisfied with the coverage I've received from UHS while a student at the University of Massachusetts.

The family practitioner, whose specialty is general medicine, was helpful when I first sought medical attention, yet there are individuals who focus upon an exclusive field.

In addition to other lessons, my UMass experience has taught me to cut through bureaucracies in search of more definitive answers to questions, such as how long it will take for a foot fracture to heal.

For future reference, the personnel for whom to ask in the event that a bone is fractured or broken is an orthopedic specialist.

Lastly, has anyone else noticed the gaping hole in the bank located on the north corner of Amity and North Pleasant Streets in the center of town?

It seems as if at one time there perhaps could have been a safe on the inside of the wall where the red brick used to be.

But, if it was there, it is no longer. Maybe someone got away with quite a heist.

I'm glad I don't save my money there and, to anyone who did, my condolences.

Grateful they're dead

Erik Molitor

This column is my own personal tribute to two well known entertainers, who have become spokesmen for our generation: Jerry Garcia and Kurt Cobain, two massively popular people who died untimely deaths. Their legacy lives on — unfortunately.

These two pieces of garbage join countless other pop culture icons who deserved to die long before their actual deaths. Garcia wound up dying while crawling to rehab for the umpteenth time, never able to muster up some type of will power so as to stay off the drugs that would finally kill him. He should have died of an overdose of his poison years ago.

As for Cobain, his splattered brains against a wall was probably the most artistic thing he ever accomplished. Suicide was the perfect escape for a semi–human who wallowed away his miseries with heroin and a trashy woman who shared in his self–destruction.

Unlike the thousands of average trash who waste their lives with drugs and hardly warrant mention here because their lives will amount to nothing, Garcia and Cobain were leaders. This is how misguided American Youth is — two wastes of human flesh could lead us into self escape, advocation of drugs, denial of responsibility and wasted youth.

I laugh when people tell me how they cried when Cobain died, or mourned for days over Garcia's death. It just proves to me what kind of sheep people are. The message from their music centered around drugs and self–misery, as if they deserved our sorrow.

What ever happened to the idea that rock 'n' roll should be fun and positive? The most depressing songs used to be about losing your girlfriend at the car hop, not about how suicide would be the perfect answer to your troubles, or how a few hits of whatever your personal poison is will pull you through the hard times.

Garcia and Cobain are supposedly the spokesmen of our generation. How can this possibly be? If you think that these people ought to be emulated, then go ahead and see where it gets you. Face down in the same gutter both of them ended up in. Get a mind of your own. MTV is not the voice to be listening to for guidance — they simply herd the sheep towards the piles of dancing bears, tie–dyed shirts and crappy tribute albums to music that sucked the first time.

Here's a joke I heard that sums up some of my thoughts — What did the druggie say when his high was over? Answer: Man, this music sucks! I also ask you, who is the more foolish, the fool, or the fool that follows him?

If you like the Grateful Dead or Nirvana for their music, than I can't argue with that, you just have a different taste than I. But if you think that they were leaders, models of virtue or representatives of our generation, you are simply wrong. Dead wrong.

Come all you young rebels...

Michael Staunton

As the movie Michael Collins makes its way to the silver screen, many Irish–Americans and others will start to take sides on the defense or the attack of the Irish Republican Army (IRA). But what people should do, instead of relying on Hollywood's depiction of the complex and loaded situation, is read up on the on–going situation. Educate yourself before deciding whether to back or to denounce the IRA's attempt to make the country of Ireland independent.

Many people in the United States, due to educational structuring and racial ignorance, are unconscious of the atrocious persecution of smaller nations like Ireland, who have suffered from intervention of larger nations like Britain.

During a period when this unwarranted takeover was seen as justified, England felt it was her duty to civilize, oppress and punish the previously independent nation of Ireland. In the years 1845 to 1849, Britain's involvement in Ireland's affairs, directly or indirectly, cost one and a half million Irish people their lives through starvation and other famine related diseases.

The Great Famine, initially started because of a ruthless wind–borne potato disease that swept through much of western Europe and completely routed entire crops — Ireland being the hardest island hit. However, although Ireland had lost all her potato crops, the main staple of an Irish peasant's diet, there was still plenty of other food produced in Ireland that would have prevented any significant famine.

Yet because the British government at the time was controlling Irish exports, there was no hold put on the shipping out of Ireland of vital food supplies. That meant that while the Irish died by the village of starvation, England was comfortably making money through foreign trade with Irish provisions and goods.

This went on for a series of sorrowful years, while more and more of their victims' graves dotted every green field on the island. Years later, the name The Great Famine was given to this blackened period in Ireland's history to signify the magnitude of loss that the Irish people suffered during this time.

This column is not a rebel bulletin, but a call for people to familiarize themselves with the past, so to understand the present. "We fought for justice and not for gain" (U2, "Van Diemen's Land") is an ideology that many people still swear by, and it is no mystery as to why this attitude exists today. But no matter how much we pray, we cannot bring back the innocent victims who have been caught in the middle. That is why the whole situation is distressful, but more importantly, it is a serious question that needs solving.

So I am asking people to be aware of ongoing struggles, and how they were sparked, before siding with the popular opinion of any environment. Because the last thing Ireland needs, or any crisis for that matter, is irrational thought.

Dangers of Rohypnol

Michelle Hillman

A new prescription drug is slipping into more than America's neighborhoods and communities. The drug Rohypnol, dubbed the "date rape" drug, is finding its way into women's drinks in southern parts of the United States.

Unsuspecting women enter a bar or nightclub, meet an apparently nice gentleman who offers to buy her a drink and then minutes later she is unconscious. When she does wake up she finds herself naked, in a strange hotel room or car, unable to remember what has happened to her. In some cases women actually wake up while the man is in the process of raping them, but are unable to act because the drug is so damaging.

The drug which is produced by Swiss pharmaceutical company Hoffman–LaRocche is a powerful tranquilizer prescribed for sleeping aid and sedatives for patients undergoing surgery. The 1–2 milligram dosage induces muscle relaxation, short–term amnesia and sleep and is felt in 15–20 minutes, lasting up to eight hours.

The drug which is made available in Latin America through a doctor's prescription and travels across the border of Mexico into the United States, is in large demand by men interested in sexually assaulting women. In fact, so many Americans have been interested in the drug that they have doubled the number of drugstores in Mexico.

Rohypnol, which is not made or approved in the United States has been found in 13 states, concentrated in Texas and Florida. Just last week a 15–year–old young woman died after a drug overdose and Rohypnol induced rape in Dallas, Texas.

Women live in a world where increasingly they must take measures to protect their safety. They are encouraged to take self–defense and martial arts courses, walk with a friend at night, carry mace or a rape whistle and not venture out alone. Now women are expected to defend themselves against a odorless, colorless drug.

The fact is that women should not have to spend money or time in order to protect themselves or their right to go out and have a few drinks. Lets get down to the real problem: the sick individuals who are purchasing this drug with the full intention of sexually assaulting a woman. This drug not only makes it increasingly easier for men to take advantage of women, but there is also the fact that the woman will not be able to defend herself verbally or physically and will be unable to recollect what happened to her the next day.

The men who purchase this drug, not only premeditate the rape of a woman, but also plan it like demented hunters lurking on unsuspecting prey. They have to physically slip this drug into a woman's drink, watch as she innocently drinks and then pounce once she becomes dizzy and sleepy. This form of assault is barbaric and animalistic. These men are cowards hiding behind a drug in order to fulfill their tormented idea of power. Power over women, power over consciousness, choice and another human being.

What is more sickening is the producer of the drug Hoffman–LaRoche, does not want to discontinue the manufacturing of the drug but is in fact fighting states initiatives to outlaw the drug. Hoffman–LaRoche fears that if the United States outlaws the drug other countries will follow, translating to a stake at $100 million in annual profits from international sales.

Instead Hoffman–LaRoche wants the drug to be classified as a Schedule IV drug, which is the ranking for medications with low potential of abuse. This ranking also puts the drug in the category of the least regulated and lowest penalty for misuse.

This company does not care that women are continually being assaulted and rape as a result of this drug. The company also does not care that many of these women are in therapy because they cannot remember what happened to them and are tortured by thoughts of possible scenarios each day. This company does not care that the DEA has filed some 2,400 criminal cases involving the drug.

What Hoffman–LaRoche does care about are its profits. They have however agreed to provide LA police with free kits to detect the drug in urine of potential suspects. Unfortunately, this does nothing for women. It is only after a woman has been raped or assaulted that a urine test would prove helpful.

Men continue to rape and are given avenues to provide them incentive to rape, such as a drug which would render a woman powerless. The fact that an explosion of a drug used for this purpose has occurred should send a red flag out to society. A society that hates male bashing, but continually fosters means in which men can and are able to act in violent, harmful ways to women.

The drug which is made available in Latin America through a doctor's prescription and travels across the border of Mexico into the United States, is in large demand by men interested in sexually assaulting women.

Letters to the Editor

Where's the racism?

To the editor:

I remember reading in the Collegian the other day about a black student by the name of Pierre Elysee, who has claimed to run into a racial confrontation. Well let me summarize what happened for those who may be unfamiliar to this article. This person went into the University Store to buy some Gas–X. He then opened the package of Gas–X which he had already bought and consumed it. He was then confronted by some white security students and they gave him a hard time. After this incident, protests occurred and eventually rallies, claiming that this incident happened because he was black.

I would not say their behavior was motivated by racism. I believe the store security did not use proper procedure when approaching Mr. Elysee. How can all these people rally against the University Store when there is no proof of racism there?

Mr. Elysee said he went "undercover" and found himself to be followed again. I have trouble believing that store employees would go out of their way to follow a black person. If I were a store employee, I would be more cautious approaching a black person than a white person in case of suspicion. I would be afraid of someone making a racial issue out of it. Besides, about a year ago, a similar incident happened with a (white female) friend of mine. Nobody made a fuss over it. It was just another example of the University Store's lack of professionalism within its security staff, not racism.

It seems like people bring themselves into these situations and then themselves look suspicious. Some people don't seem to understand that there is a set of rules for dealing with these store–type situations... I guess you could call it common sense. There are certain things you could avoid doing that would bring attention to yourself in a store. If one does this, one should not be surprised if they are being watched by or even confronted by store security. I don't know about you, but I find myself instinctively avoiding these situations whenever I go into a store.

So, I do not believe the University Store incident is linked with racism. I'll show you racism, look at Affirmative Action. The name sounds particularly intimidating. So what happens with Affirmative Action is the government gets involved with companies and tells them that they have a quota of black employees to fill. They must maintain a certain percentage of black employees or they will face consequences. Even if it means laying off a qualified, non–black worker for a non–qualified black worker. Now that's racism. Laws like that were made to combat racism, when in itself it is racism. Or maybe you like the PC version from a quote of Bob Dole's speech a few weeks ago, "one man's privilege is another man's loss."

There was also the issue of the University Store being unfair to minority students. It has been said that the store has 300 non–blacks and 25 blacks. There are so few blacks employed because there is a small black population at UMass. I feel that the ratio of race among employees should reflect the ratio of the local population. Our University has under five percent black population, so out of 325 employees, there should be a little over 15 black employees. I feel the store is well within a reasonable number of black employees.

I think we should encourage people to discourage racism, not to walk around with eyes closed and mouth wide open, calling people racists. That is a cop–out and seems to be used widely amongst certain students. Without having reasonable proof, making feeble accusations of racism will not get you anywhere.

I can sympathize with Mr. Elysee, for being wrongfully accused of stealing and then humiliated in front of students. But I just cannot agree with him on why this happened. People make mistakes and that's all that happened.

Story full of misinformation

To the editor:

On October 17, I was involved in an accident involving a UMass Transit bus and a motorcycle. Although I was not hurt, the accident was extremely traumatic.

On Tuesday, October 22, the Collegian reported that I was the operator of the motorcycle. The story also reported that I was hospitalized and had been issued a citation upon investigation of the accident by UMass police.

This news was a surprise to me considering I was actually the unhurt driver of the parked bus that was involved in the accident. Included in the story was my correct home address. In my opinion, this is a case of gross irresponsibility on the part of the Collegian. If the paper insists on printing my name and address in the paper, they could at least get the facts of the case straight.

Misprints such as this are all too common in the Collegian, and something should be done to curtail the number of misprints. There are people behind these stories, and reputations and feelings are easily damaged by irresponsible newswriters. The staff of the Collegian should strive for perfection and professionalism and should be embarrassed by these mistakes.

In the name of honor

To the editor:

I want to express my appreciation of Pierre A. Elysee's letter, "Keeping an Eye on the Campus Store" (October 29). As we know, the media is ever and all too eager to report ad nauseam on "glamorous" and dramatic racial blow–ups like the Rodney King incident — and by so doing further exploit the victim, deepen the divisiveness and sell newspapers. But it is really the daily grind and chipping away, the small stuff, which Elysee so eloquently describes, that does the most harm. For it is easy to identify the grosser crimes, easy to incite anger, easy to inspire people to "take sides" as though it were a game and easy to then drop it all because another opportunity to repeat the whole scintillating process will reoccur shortly.

That subtle, sly denigration of a people which results form an attitude — an attitude which others goes unrecognized by the very person holding it — it is that which is deadly. And the world created by that attitude is the prison in which minorities live — not in big dramatic bursts but moment by moment, hour by hour, day by day.

It is a courageous and honorable thing Elysee does. For to call attention to these "smaller" incidents carries the strong risk of being dismissed as a trouble–maker obsessed with trivialities. Nothing could be further from the truth. And until we can all, whatever our color, know this lived truth, pointing it out over and over and over and over again, whenever and wherever we see it, we cannot expect to share his honor.

Amherst pet peeves

Brad Davidson

After living in Amherst for four years now, I have come to realize that there are around a zillion pet peeves I have. Some are small things that annoy me and others are things that frankly disturb me. In numerous discussions and aimless ramblings with friends and strangers, I am confident that many others feel the same way. I can no longer hold them back; the time has come to speak out. Here are my three most pressing ones for this week.

The war of the dryer: Everytime I go to the laundromat, I feel like I'm going to kill someone. First of all no one wants to be there. Laundromats are overpriced, overcrowded and generally smell pretty foul because nobody there has showered yet. Also people are usually wearing the same set of clothes that they've been sporting for a week, which is why they're doing laundry in the first place.

The part I hate the most is the dryer war. I never seem to have a problem finding available washing machines, but there are never enough dryers. The dryers are always full and they all seem to have around 32 minutes left until they will be vacant. So I sit there like a moron and wait until time elapses. Then when time finally does elapse, around 13 people will jump in and yell, "I've been waiting for this dryer for an hour!" Hence I always lose out and have to wait until another machine is available. I don't mind having to wait, but I just can't stand it how people seem willing to kill their own mother to get a dryer. Wake Up!

Rush me out the bar: I think it goes without saying that Amherst, Mass. is not the mecca for the ideal bar scene. In all the colleges and towns that I have visited, never have I been more disappointed in the bars than in Amherst. I always pledge never to go out and usually stick to it. However, once in a while, I am forced to go out in order to celebrate a birthday or anniversary.

The most annoying part of going to a bar in Amherst, besides waiting in lines, never getting served and not being able to move at all, is last call. It is my understanding that bars can't serve alcohol after 1 a.m. Why is it that you must leave exactly at 1 a.m. then? If last call is at 12:45 p.m. and you want to sit and enjoy a beer with some friends, then why must some pinhead come around and scream, "Drink up, lets go!"

I realize that everyone wants to go home after work, but take it easy. People are paying their hard earned dough to have a drink. Please let them enjoy it and stop adding to the ridiculous culture of speed drinking.

In the history of the nation, not one positive thing has happened as a result of speed drinking. On the flip side, there has been a constant rise of date rape, drunk driving and alcohol poisoning due to careless abuse of a substance that is used and promoted incorrectly. Wake Up!

Radio: Being involved in radio, I am often a major critic of the industry and the ideas that they promote. Besides the fact that I am going to be physically ill if I hear Alanis or Celine Dion one more time, I think that sometimes radio stations are truly run by people that were born without a brain. Unfortunately this is due to the fact that most radio stations act irresponsibly in pursue of the advertising dollar. Never was this fact so clearly proven then the other night when I was driving in my car.

It was around 8 or 9 p.m. and I was driving back from the supermarket. I was scanning the radio when I stopped on 95.7 WKSS in Hartford. As the song ended I heard the most degrading and ridiculous advertisement in the history of radio.

The advert was for a club called "The Stadium," located in Bristol, Conn. The advert was a promotion for Friday nights which stated that the higher your skirt is, the cheaper your admission would be. Sounds unbelievable huh? I was so shocked when I heard it that I called the on air D.J. just to confirm I wasn't hearing things. The D.J. confirmed it without any hesitation.

I can't really put into words the anger and disappointment I felt in hearing such a crude ad. Do these people not understand what they are promoting? Do they not understand the implications? Do they not realize that they are degrading women and promoting them strictly as sexual objects? It it really worth it for a few extra advertising bucks? Unfortunately in the eyes of WKSS 95.7 it is. Wake Up!

Marsalis steals 'Trane; Mitchells a blast

BRANFORD MARSALIS
The Dark Keys
Columbia Records

The most popular saxophone player around nowadays is back, and on The Dark Keys, he is also very laid back. This new album presents the former "Tonight Show" band–leader in a (mostly) trio format. Supporting him throughout the album are drummer Jeff "Tain" Watts and bassist Reginald Veal.

When the disc starts off, an experienced jazz listener may have a double–take, wondering if somehow John Coltrane's A Love Supreme wasn't incorrectly labelled as Marsalis' new album. Marsalis opens the title track, and the disc, with a musical quote from the beginning of A Love Supreme, which Marsalis swears was "an accident" in a press release. After his little unintentional tribute, "The Dark Keys" goes on to present, in its later moments, a fascinating sax/drums duo that slows down near the end, like two friends dragging out a conversation.

Despite the raucous and driving quality of the title track, the key word for most of this disc is definitely "spare." Marsalis' plays an elegy called "A Thousand Autumns," for veteran sax player (and Marsalis' idol) Wayne Shorter's wife, who was killed in this summer's T.W.A. Flight 800 tragedy. The song is played in such an open and solemn manner that it even sounds like a sad shake of the head at the loss of so many lives.

Marsalis breaks the trio mode twice to jam with tenor saxophonist Joe Lovano (on "Sentinel") and another currently popular sax player, Kenny Garrett (on "Judas Iscariot.") "Sentinel" has the feel of a long distance runner in that it starts out steady and confident and, towards the end, lags into a jogging pace. However, this runner gets a second wind before it closes. "Judas Iscariot" is a boisterous friendly sparring contest between the two hottest saxo– phonists playing these days, both on alto.

The last song for this new disc is "Schott Happens," which veers into straight be–bop territory (which too many new jazz musicians wall themselves into.) It is one of the only upbeat tunes on the disc, and is also probably the best. It could have been left off to keep the theme of spare arrangements, but what fun would that have been? Marsalis really shows why he is one of the few jazz musicians who have crossed over into popular culture with his fiery soloing on the disc closer (Jay Leno had something to do with his popularity, too, off course.)

Only really "dark" in its openness and reserved energy (released in a few places with frightening dedication,) The Dark Keys is a completely different side of Marsalis than most have seen in the large–ensemble format of the "Tonight Show" Band and his pre–Leno albums back into the 1980s. B+ (Joshua Boyd)

THE MITCHELLS
Four Song Cassette EP

Anyone who has been to enough local shows has probably seen The Mitchells at least once. That's not a bad thing, of course. In fact, it's often the only predictably good thing about local shows. Just because you've seen The Mitchells, though, doesn't mean you've actually heard The Mitchells. Not unless you've got a copy of this wonderful four song EP, that is.

Putting the guitars right up front where they belong, The Mitchells kick things of in glorious style with "Sick," a song that beautifully showcases the sparkling two guitar interplay, sometimes reminiscent of Television's less lucid moments, and the fluid, rock solid rhythm section. Kayvan Darouian and Caleb Wetmore are probably some of the most imaginative guitarists in the Valley, eschewing walls of discordant distortion for intelligent and tightly wound arrangements.

Perhaps the most surprising thing about the EP are Wetmore's vocals. Often lost in the muddy mixes of basement PA's, Wetmore's vocals here are confident and smooth, at times reminiscent of New Order's Bernard Sumner — smart and engaging, with a similar ear for the subtle hook and catchy phrase.

The Mitchells have done their fans a great service by creating more than just a document of their live performances— they reach into the songs here, capturing all of the disparate elements that work together toward the surprising and imaginative whole. A solid, exciting collection of songs. B (Bradley Skaught)

AMY RIGBY
Diary of a Mod Housewife
Koch

Even as we speak, the major labels are preparing to unleash the next round of Liz Phair wannabes — cursing and spitting on whatever teenage disillusion they can dredge up, regardless of an ability to actually express something or write a song. Thank God Amy Rigby came along to knock some sense into rock 'n' roll.

Rigby can probably curse and spit with the best of them, but instead she chooses to write songs of startling depth and resonance. Housewife is a document of the reluctance road to middle age — a snapshot of the mom with a broom in one hand and an electric guitar in the other. Rigby is, indeed, the Mod–housewife of the title, and her ability to turn a phrase around a beautiful melody is a testament to her great empathy with the lifestyle she explores, and her command of the roots rock vocabulary.

Highlights of Housewife include the heartbreaking "Sad Tale," the brilliant country duet "Beer and Kisses" (with John Wesley Harding) and the Lesley Gore–with–an–attitude rave up "The Good Girls." It's the album's centerpiece, however, that best displays the clarity and depth of Rigby's writing. "Knapsack" is the humorous, bittersweet tale of unrequited love — an amazingly "inside" look at one fascinating slice of life.

Rigby rarely falters on Housewife, even when the production lacks the punch to give her weaker songs a kick. It's a fantastic debut from a woman who can speak about herself, her experiences and the experiences of those around her without resorting to mindless cursing and spitting. One of the more impressive debuts this year. B+ (B.S.)

JERRY GARCIA & DAVID GRISMAN
Shady Grove
Acoustic Disc

Before the acid tests, before he was bestowed with the nickname "Captain Trips," before the Haight–Ashbury, and, yes, before even the Grateful Dead, Jerry Garcia was a folkie. In the early '60s, with short hair and a goatee, Garcia associated himself with the folk and bluegrass crowd around his hometown of Palo Alto, Calif.. At the same time, across the country in New York City, the young mandolinist David Grisman was in with the same crowd as the Greenwich Village–era Bob Dylan.

Once their paths crossed through a mutual friend, it was only a matter of time before they would become lifelong, if not full–time, partners in playing traditional and original country, bluegrass and blues. Shady Grove is the result of Grisman recently digging through his many tapes recorded with Garcia and others, made in guerilla recording sessions in the early '90s.

The whole collection is an amazing display of musical ability, as well as often heart–ripping tragic and sad songs. The first half of the disc is mostly done with not only Garcia and Grisman, but also others on fiddle and bass. The English sea chantey "Off To Sea Once More," is plaintively sung with a necessary rasp by Garcia, and is a simply depressing tune. Another English

Lloyd Webber reworks 1975 By Jeeves

America's master playwright brings play to Chester, Conn.

By Michael Kuchwara
Associated Press

CHESTER, Conn. — Andrew Lloyd Webber has been quoted recently as saying that the era of the big musical may be over. Well, the man has put his melodies where his mouth is.

He and playwright Alan Ayckbourn have reworked and downsized their flop 1975 musical Jeeves, retitling it By Jeeves and putting the show on stage at the Goodspeed Opera House's other home, the tiny, 200-seat Norma Terris Theater.

The result is mild entertainment, maybe a tad too English for American audiences and more than a little meandering, particularly in its too chatty and musically undernourished first act.

Their creation, of course, was suggested by P.G. Wodehouse's delightful stories about Jeeves, the omnipotent and ever-resourceful British manservant, and Bertie Wooster, his hapless, dimwitted employer.

Ayckbourn, who also directed the show and wrote the lyrics, threw out his book of more than 20 years ago. For the new version, he has concocted a rather convoluted tale, a farce set within an act of desperation.

In it, Bertie is scheduled to give a benefit banjo concert. When the instrument is stolen, a frantic Bertie, with a little help from Jeeves, improvises a play about mistaken identity for the audience. That's the production the audience sees.

Bertie conjures up this musical diversion with a minimum of props and scenery, something of a change from such set-driven Lloyd Webber extravaganzas as Cats, The Phantom of the Opera and Sunset Boulevard.

There's a charm in this minimalism, which unfortunately gets diluted in the laborious story line of By Jeeves. In it, there are several sets of mismatched lovers sporting such blissfully eccentric names as Gussie Fink-Nottle, Stiffy Byng, Bingo Little, Honoria Glossop, Cyrus Budge III and the ever-popular Stinker Pinker.

It takes an entire act for Ayckbourn to crank up his tale to full speed. That doesn't leave much room for song. There are long dry stretches in the first act where By Jeeves is more of a play with music than a musical.

The story finds its humor in eccentricity, something that can get a bit precious, especially if the cast pushes too hard. In By Jeeves, the actors mug a bit, putting over jokes about hedgehogs, for example, with more than the required supply of enthusiasm. Silly is something that is not easy to pull off, and here the strain shows.

Lloyd Webber's most potent songs - the jaunty title tune, a dotty duet called "When Love Arrives" and "Half a Moment," the show's big love ballad — arrive in Act 2, and the proceedings perk up considerably. These numbers are beguiling, exuding a simplicity far removed from the grandiose, sweeping melodies that characterize much of Lloyd Webber's better-known work.

Ayckbourn's lyrics are intelligent and often funny, a quality not often found in the wordsmiths who previously have assisted Lloyd Webber. His direction, though, plods on, resolutely moving the story forward without much style until the Act 2 musical numbers give the show some zip.

The performers are agreeable, if not overwhelming. John Scherer works hard as the unraveling Bertie, and he possesses a fine singing voice. Richard Kline makes a competent Jeeves, although he really hasn't much to do except occasionally show up and bail Bertie's bacon out of the dramatic fire.

Of the young ladies, Nancy Anderson stands out of the pack. She has a genteel goofiness that captures the Wodehouse style. And Emily Loesser has a sweet singing voice that more than does justice to "Half a Moment."

To its credit, By Jeeves does build to a suitably jolly ending featuring a Wizard of Oz –style extravaganza that could have been lifted out of a British pantomime.

A cheerful and melodic looniness dominates this finale, particularly when it is punctuated by a robust, toe-tapping number called "Banjo Boy" that has Bertie "silently" playing the instrument.

It's the kind of loopiness that rarely surfaces in this most peculiar and particular of Lloyd Webber musicals. All in all, "By Jeeves" is an odd little duck.

aire, "Dreadful Wind And Rain," was re–arranged in the '60s by a friend of Garcia, giving it chord change rhythms that Garcia would use quite a bit in his Dead songs. It is the best up–tempo song on the disc.

They do quite a bit of country blues here, as well. Two Mississippi John Hurt–arranged songs, "Louis Collins" and "Casey Jones" from the '20s and '30s — both are sung with the same relaxed storytelling authority by Garcia as they were in Hurt's low, calm voice.

Two of the songs on this disc were in and out of the Dead's repertoire at different times. "Stealin'," a Memphis Jug Band tune, is a simple blues, and "Jack–A–Roe," worked out here with an uplifting feel (and given its original name of "Jackaroo"), with Garcia's guitar, Grisman's mandolin and Joe Craven's fiddle providing great hooks.

This collection features a side of Garcia that not enough people have seen, causing many to not be able to look past the rambling jams of the Grateful Dead or his problematic drug addictions. Grisman's firm mandolin playing is great accompaniment to some of Garcia's finest moments. B+ (J.B.)

Sixers stun Knicks, Iverson scores 35

By Chris Sheridan
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Allen Iverson scored 35 points, caused both opposing point guards to foul out and iced the game from the foul line last night to lead the Philadelphia 76ers to a surprising 101-97 road victory over the New York Knicks.

Iverson, the No. 1 overall pick in last June's draft and already the most exciting rookie in the NBA, was too quick and too talented for the Knicks to stop.

He scored 15 points in the third quarter and 10 in the fourth, his final seven coming from the foul line. In all, Iverson was 10-for-19 from the field and 10-for-17 from the line as he bettered his previous career-high by three points.

Iverson made five 3-pointers and had seven rebounds, six assists and two steals, and he repeatedly drew contact from New York's slower point guards. Charlie Ward committed six fouls in 29 minutes and backup Scott Brooks fouled out in 15 minutes.

Jerry Stackhouse added 28 points, five assists and four rebounds, Derrick Coleman had 16 points and Scott Williams 15 for the Sixers, who had lost eight of their previous nine games against New York.

Larry Johnson scored 28 points and Patrick Ewing had 26 points and 15 rebounds for the Knicks, but in a game that featured 15 lead changes and 17 ties, both failed to score on the one late possession when a basket was most needed.

Iverson went to the line for three shots after drawing Ward's sixth foul with 1:34 left. He made two to give Philadelphia a 95-93 lead.

Ewing scored on a short baseline jumper to tie it, and Iverson rebounded his own miss and set up Coleman for two foul shots to restore the two-point lead.

Iverson then stole the ball from John Starks when a pass bounced out of the New York guard's hands. He was fouled and made one of two for a 98-95 lead with 38 seconds left.

New York had three chances to score, but Ewing missed a turnaround jumper and Johnson missed twice from 3-point range. After Philadelphia rebounded, Iverson was fouled with 5.9 seconds left and made one for a 99-95 lead.

Ewing scored with 1.8 seconds left, but Stackhouse restored the four-point lead by making two foul shots with 1.2 seconds left.

Notes: The loss dropped New York's record to 5-2. The Sixers evened their record at 3-3...Philadelphia got only six points from its bench players, four by Mark Davis and two by Lucious Harris. The Knicks' reserves scored only 15, including a season-low two by John Wallace... Knicks shooting guard Allan Houston was scoreless in the first half and finished 2-for-10 for seven points... Johnson had a rare hat trick — three straight misses from the foul line in the first quarter after the Sixers were called for two lane violations.

Pistons defeat Bullets, Detroit now 5–1

By David Ginsburg
Associated Press

LANDOVER, Md. — The surprising Detroit Pistons limited Washington to 30 points in the decisive first half and got 24 points from Grant Hill in a 92-79 victory Tuesday night.

Terry Mills scored 19 for the Pistons, who improved to 5-1 overall and 3-0 on the road. Detroit lost its first six away games last season and went until Dec. 19 before winning a third time on the road.

The Pistons have flourished this season with defense, and this game exemplified that. The Bullets shot 26 percent in the first half, making only 12 of 46 shots and committing eight turnovers. Chris Webber finished with 19 points and Juwan Howard 15 for the Bullets, who have lost three straight and are 1-3 at home. Washington shot 38 percent overall and needed a late run to surpass the franchise-low for points in a game (69).

Howard opened the game with a layup, but Mills and Hill each had five points in a 12-2 burst that put Detroit ahead for good. After the Bullets closed to 14-12, Joe Dumars hit a pair of 3-pointers in a 14-3 run that gave the Pistons a 28-15 lead after the quarter. Washington didn't score in the final 2:09 of the first period, then went scoreless while missing seven straight shots in the opening four minutes of the second quarter. By the time Webber hit a jumper with 7:54 left, the Pistons had a 33-17 lead.

It was 40-22 before Hill hit a runner in the lane and Mills added successive 3-pointers to make it 48-22. Washington missed 16 of its first 19 shots in the second period and needed an 8-0 spree just to get within 18 at halftime.

Washington cut the margin to 14 midway through the third quarter, but a 3-point play by Otis Thorpe and a basket by Hill made it 68-48 late in the period.

Detroit took a 73-53 lead into the fourth quarter.

Notes: Washington 7-foot-7 center Gheroghe Muresan, who missed the first five games with a strained hip flexor, had four points and three rebounds in his season debut... The Pistons activated forward Don Reid from the injured list Tuesday and placed rookie forward Jerome Williams on the IL with a sprained left wrist... Detroit has not yielded 100 points in any of its six games.

senior co-captain also ripped down seven boards in defeat.

Senior guard Beth Kuzmeski, Carroll's partner in captainship, missed the game due to a strained tendon in her foot, and coach O'Brien is unsure of how long she will be out of commission. O'Brien is hopeful that both Kuzmeski and junior forward Tez Krafi will be ready to go against Ohio State Nov. 24.

Stepping in for Kuzmeski, UMass' designated long-range bomber, was freshman guard/forward Allison MacFarland. The Brick, New Jersey native struggled from the field (1-for-8 on three-pointers) but contributed nine points and four assists in the losing effort.

Bradley started at small forward and pitched in 11 points and eight rebounds in 30 minutes on the floor.

seemed like a playoff team with a fantastic 4-0 start, continued to hurt their chances with a loss to Seattle, one of the weaker AFC teams. And while both are long shots for the playoffs, San Diego ran over Detroit on Monday night.

Some of the AFC's other better teams, like New England and Pittsburgh have also done well against the NFC. Of their combined six losses, only one has come to an out-of- conference opponent.

That's not even to mention the best team in the league right now — Denver. Their biggest test, which could be a real Super Bowl preview, will be against Green Bay in week 15. By then Favre should be back in synch with his receivers, and it should be a great match between two of the NFL's best offenses and defenses.

Another big test for the Broncos will come Sunday, as they face the 7-3 Patriots, the best New England's been in just over ten years.

The game will feature potent offenses with some interesting similarities. The team's have two of the best quarterbacks currently — John Elway and Drew Bledsoe; the two best running backs from last year's draft — Terrell Davis and Curtis Martin; and two pro-bowl tight ends — Shannon Sharpe and Ben Coates.

The difference could be in the defense. Denver finally has one, which is what could let Elway finally earn a ring for the entire QB class of '83.

New England doesn't seem to have one, stat-wise, but that can be deceiving. The defensive squad buckles down when it has to, allowing only six points after the mid-point of the second quarter to the Jets and only three points off four turnovers to Miami the week before. If they can continue to stop opposing teams from scoring when they have to this weekend, New England could be the winner in this possible AFC championship preview.

Women's V-ball team up for BC

By Steven Grant
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts Minutewomen will face the Boston College Eagles in their last non-conference match of the season tonight at 7 p.m. at Curry Hicks Cage, before they face four straight tough Atlantic 10 opponents to end the regular season.

UMass is currently in the thick of things for a playoff spot, given to the top four teams in the conference. Rhode Island and Dayton are pretty much guaranteed to qualify, while the Minutewomen, Temple and Virginia Tech, to name a few, are on the bubble.

This past weekend, the Minutewomen cruised by Fordham and La Salle at home, but fell to the Temple Owls in a crucial match. So if nothing else, tonight's affair with the Eagles (13-16) is a chance to pick up some momentum before entering the homestretch.

B.C., coached by Nadine Lilavois, has lost nine of its last ten matches, and is 0-9 in the Big East. What's more, UMass is 15-5 all-time against its intrastate rivals, dating back to 1978.

The Eagles are led by senior co-captain Deanna Herman, who is averaging 3.9 kills per game, and 379 overall. The outside hitter's 2.1 digs per game is good for second on the club.

Bonnie Kenny's squad also better be on the lookout for junior Amy Laurence, who is earning 2.9 kills per game. But more importantly, it should probably hit the ball somewhere else, as she leads the Eagles in digs with 2.6 per game.

Junior middle hitter Natalie Scott's .237 hitting percentage is the best of a poor bunch, while her 1.2 blocks per game is also tops.

But other than that, there isn't much, and UMass shouldn't have too much trouble. Shouldn't.

Here's what Kenny had to say after the loss to Temple: "Our middle blocking was atrocious [in the last two games]. Our middle back defense became atrocious. The middle of the court killed us all night."

It seems as if some of the problems Kenny had hoped might be solved at this point in the season have yet to be solved. But a match against a team like B.C. might be the perfect way to get back on track, to gain confidence and work on the areas that need them.

After tonight, the Minutewomen take on Dayton and Xavier this weekend at home, on Friday and Saturday, respectively.

spine, baby. I got those when the Broad Street Bullies went toe-to-toe with the Original Six-ers, and what was more fantastic was that the goalies got into it, too. (Hey, let me hear ya' say "way-o!"... way-o!!!)

Philly's Ron Hextall (8-5, 2.16 GAA) and Toronto's Felix Potvin (8-6, 2.94 GAA), two notorious workhorses between the pipes, got on their warhorses and mixed it up with their boys. This is one thing you do not see often, and it is good to see that goalies still have some moxie in them.

Hextall has always been somewhat of a hothead (all legend Cam Neely had to do was breathe on him to psyche him out), but Felix the Cat's bravado was admirable; especially against a stud like Hextall. Besides stunts like color-coding hockey pucks, and basically every major decision NHL commissioner Gary Bettman has made, there is still hope for this game yet.

Blind, utter violence, now that's old-time hockey.

• In the "better left unsaid, but not unwritten" category, how about that Saku Koivu from the Montreal Canadians? Yes, me and Torbin had intended to mention Msr. Koivu in our preseason picks for surprise players of the year, but a little thing called "space logistics" (i.e. the Collegian needed to print things like News, and Arts and Living, that day, too) held us back.

Believe me, it hurts to give any sort of credit to a player who wears the bleu, blanc et rouge; or to even give space to a... uh, gulp... Montreal Canadian, but sometimes the quality of a player goes beyond a regional rivalry. If any of you are women's soccer fans out there, a certain set of twins from a hick school in the sticks (i.e. the Tietjens from UConn) are wonderfully brought to mind.

The Finnish international has been lighting the lamp, and providing the spark for his teammates, too. The trade for Mark Recchi, which sent LeClair and Eric Desjardins to Philly, seems to be finally panning out, as both players hold almost the exact same stats: both Koivu and Recchi have seven goals, with the hyvaa poika ("good boy" in Finnish) from historic Turku, Finland tallying one more assist (15).

Now, you must be saying, "Jorma, you are Finnish, and should we even take you the slight bit seriously, you bloody Homer?" Like I said, quality shines through, and this kid is quality through and through. And, by the way, who are you to call me a Homer?

• I hate agents. I hate agents more than I hate the Canadians, and also hockey teams that haven't seen snow since Frosty the Snowman. As of late, one agent has got underneath my craw — Brian Cook, whose client is one Adam Oates of the Boston Bruins.

Teams play badly, seem to have no chance in Hell and rumors abound about how star players want the hell out of Dodge. Then, scum agents get into the mix, talk to scum, I mean, lumber-jock reporters and next thing you know, controversy is sprayed all over sports sections; especially in historically hockey-mad Beantown.

Let's get it out, right now, the Bruins are playing awful. Even though I bleed Black and Gold, I have the ability to admit when we are crap. So, this is the case with Oates, and in the past, a superstar by any other name would not play as sweet. But this is the problem, he hasn't been playing sweetly, sister, and trade rumors have begun. Therefore, Cook is now saying to anyone who will listen that he and Bruins demi-god, and president/general manager, Harry Sinden have talked about shipping Oates out of town.

Twist in the story, though, as Harry says he has not talked about a trade. So, now it is a matter of he said/scum said. It is a sad, sad situation with the Bruins, and it is getting more and more absurd. The last thing the B's need, with Ray Bourque coming off an injury (shoulder); Rick Tocchet possibly succumbing to an injury (yes, shoulder); and rumblings about firing coach Steve Kasper, is having our only healthy star seditiously plastered over the printed page.

If he wants out, then do it. It will be a dark day when that happens. Truthfully, he's the only B's player for whom we can get something substantial in return. Forget about Bourque or goalie Bill Ranford, you have to think defense first. I can't help but reminisce about the Good Old Days, though, when we were successful in the back in the real Cash-dens. In the days of my youth,...

Chinese peasants revolt against taxes

By Joseph B. Frazier
Associated Press

HONG KONG (AP) — Infuriated by heavy taxes, peasants marched, broke into government buildings and destroyed property in south China, killing one village leader and injuring others, a Hong Kong newspaper reported Monday.

The revolts broke out in Qidong, in Hunan province, in September after peasants discovered city authorities had kept secret for six months a directive from Beijing to end excessive taxes, the Oriental Daily News said.

Peasants complained they were ordered to pay excessive fees, and were penalized more than 30 percent for late payment, the newspaper said. Farmers reportedly claimed their homes were raided for valuables to pay the debts.

Several hundred peasants started the rally Sept. 4, the independent newspaper reported. By the time more than 10,000 people had gathered outside government buildings, holding senior officials inside, protesters started wrecking doors, windows, desks and other property, the newspaper said.

Scuffles ensued when police fired tear gas at the protesters, injuring many, it said.

The protest led to revolts in neighboring villages, and a local leader was beaten to death by angry peasants, the Chinese-language newspaper said.

After subsequent revolts, the authorities agreed Sept. 11 to trim the tolls, it said. About 10 protesters reportedly were arrested.

An official in the Qidong County government said details in the Oriental Daily report were incorrect.

The confrontation started in April when about 400-500 people marched on the county government, said the official, who gave only his surname, Xiao.

He refused to elaborate but said the official Xinhua News Agency had sent an investigative team.

A spokeswoman for Xinhua, Ms. Xie, refused to say whether the agency had reported the events in Qidong. The Chinese government often bars all media but Xinhua from reporting sensitive events, thus ensuring unfavorable accounts will not circulate.

The financial burden on China's farmers is a politically explosive matter because traditional Chinese dynasties were toppled by peasant revolts following long periods of oppression.

The ruling Communists came to power by winning the support of China's downtrodden farmers with promises of a better life.

Farmers' lives have improved dramatically during China's 17 years of economic reforms, but in recent years their incomes have dropped, eroded by inflation and taxes. The fees, for everything from "toilet management" to road construction, have driven some farmers to suicide and others to riot.

Small amounts of aid reach Goma; U.N. Intervention Plan on hold

By Tony Smith
Associated Press

GOMA, Zaire — Small amounts of emergency food and medicine trickled into this eastern Zairian town today after a long delay at the Zaire-Rwanda border.

Tutsi rebel leader Laurent Kabila agreed over the weekend to allow aid agencies into Zaire's eastern cities, where fighting in the past month sent more than a million refugees fleeing into inhospitable forests and mountains without food or water.

The longer we wait, the more serious it gets," said Samantha Bolton, spokeswoman for Doctors Without Borders, one of 12 groups that managed to deliver supplies to Goma's soccer stadium for distribution to the city's hospital.

It was not clear whether any aid would reach the 80,000 residents of Goma, who have not had access to fresh food for 10 days.

Bolton said the aid delivered would remain in Goma because it was impossible to get food and water to the hundreds of thousands of Rwandan Hutu refugees scattered further west without military protection.

Her agency, the Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies and several other aid agencies were also trying to get emergency food into Bukavu, a rebel-held Zairian town 60 miles south of Goma.

Fighting since September between Zairian troops and ethnic Tutsis they are trying to drive out of the country has uprooted more than 1.1 million Rwandan Hutu refugees, as well as nearly 150,000 Burundian Hutu refugees and an unknown number of local Zairians.

The last foreign aid workers fled eastern Zaire more than a week ago.

For two nights running, mortars fired either by Zairian troops or their armed Rwandan Hutu allies have fallen on residential neighborhoods in Goma.

Seven miles northwest of Goma, Rwandan Hutu militia are believed to control the main road leading past vacant and trashed U.N. refugee camps toward the interior of Zaire.

Bolton said her agency had reached the central Zairian city of Kisangani, 330 miles northwest of Goma, where some 60,000 Rwandan Hutu refugees were reported to have fled.

There were reports that retreating Zairian army troops were looting and shooting up the city.

African foreign ministers were meeting in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, today to debate how to protect aid deliveries into Zaire.

Several African countries including Ethiopia, Mali, Senegal, Chad and Congo have offered troops for such a mission, but the African nations have no transport or logistical capacity.

Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi rebuked the U.N. Security Council for failing to adopt a resolution that would have created — and funded — an intervention force.

"It is indeed a pity," Meles said as the meeting opened, "that when African countries have shown a clear disposition to fulfill their responsibilities and to take the lead on matters that affect them directly ... they are being denied an effective means to do this by the same international community which has nonetheless shown readiness to spend billions in an effort to address the humanitarian problem."

Apparently because of U.S. hesitation, the U.N. Security Council stopped short Saturday of funding a military force to secure humanitarian corridors to aid the Hutu refugees in Zaire and encourage them to return home.

U.S. State Department spokesman Nicholas Burns, however, denied that the Clinton administration was blocking the intervention force.

"You have to consider the question before you send troops in," Burns told reporters today as he traveled with Secretary of State Warren Christopher to a Mideast economic conference.

Cyclone survivors try to pick up the pieces; 1,000 men presumed missing

By Omer Farooq
Associated Press

AMALAPURAM, India — The wives of Indian fishermen sat with their children today and waited with the desperate hope that their husbands were not among the more than 1,000 people known killed by a powerful cyclone.

Five days after the storm roared across India's southern coast, another 1,000 missing fishermen are presumed dead — except by their wives.

"If you see him anywhere tell him I am waiting," said Laxmi Rao, holding a framed photograph of her husband, Dharma Rao.

Mrs. Rao's home was completely destroyed by the cyclone that struck Wednesday night. She managed to escape with one steel trunk holding her silver jewelry, some clothes and her husband's black and white photograph.

Today, she sat in a relief center amid other cyclone victims and the muffled sound of mourning.

Six months pregnant and clutching her 3-year-old son, Sattiraja, Mrs. Rao contemplated the future.

"Where do I go from here?" she asked.

Another woman, the mother of five and who only uses the name Satyabati, was awaiting word from her husband, V. Raju.

"If he does not return what I am going to do?" she asked.

For others, the work of reassembling homes and lives has begun.

Thousands of survivors who have been living in schools and government buildings visited the ruins of their homes today and surveyed the damage.

The Andhra Pradesh state government said it would give money and material for rehabilitation.

"We are trying to encourage the people to get going and rebuild or repair their homes," said Phanandra Reddy, a senior relief official.

The coast guard was continuing today to search for the missing fishermen in the Bay of Bengal. Vessels found 45 bodies floating in the rough waters on Sunday and had recovered 50 bodies the day before.

On land, Andhra Pradesh state's relief crews worked to bring in food, water and medicines to an estimated 500,000 people, a state government official, A.M. Reddy, said.

Health workers fear cholera and other gastrointestinal diseases could quickly spread. Five hundred paramedics have been dispatched to the area; the region was short of medical facilities before the storm.

Officials have yet to destroy several thousand animal carcasses strewn along the coast and in villages, posing a serious health hazard.

Vultures and crows were seen feasting on the dead cows, buffaloes and dogs. Bloated carcasses floated in canals that crisscross the area.

At least 250 coastal villages were hit by 15-foot-high waves after the cyclone. Many villages, like Amalapuram, are in ruins.

Raghava Reddy, a farm laborer, and his two sons searched the debris of their shattered home today in search of nails, which they then straightened out.

"I will need them to rebuild our home," he said.

Firefighters tackle massive oil blaze

By Joseph B. Frazier
Associated Press

SAN JUAN IXHUATEPEC, Mexico — Pumping water and building walls of mud and sand, firefighters struggled in vain yesterday to extinguish flames at a fuel storage complex where three oil tanks exploded.

An oil worker and a fireman died of burns from the blaze, which turned 4.2 million gallons of fuel into a tower of black smoke over this industrial suburb north of Mexico City.

The tanks exploded Monday afternoon, triggered by work being done on a faulty valve. More than 24 hours later, firefighters were still on the scene, building the sand-and-mud dikes to prevent other massive tanks nearby from catching fire.

Firemen, police and soldiers evacuated about 2,400 families from working-class neighborhoods nearby. No homes were damaged or seriously threatened.

Killed in the fire were oil worker Antonio Ibarra Gonzalez, 34, and fireman Jose Luis Romero de Torre, 46, according to the state-run Petroleos Mexicanos, or Pemex, which owns the facility.

Pemex said 13 people were hospitalized, and the Mexican Red Cross said about 900 people received first aid, mostly for smoke inhalation.

Federal environmental experts and Pemex officials promised a thorough investigation.

Pemex Director Adrian Lajous, in a radio interview, said hundreds of trucks had been sent to drain the gasoline from the three unexploded tanks. He said the gasoline burned was about one day's supply for the capital, but that no shortages were expected.

Lajous said the first tank apparently exploded because of repair work to a faulty valve. Soon after, a second tank exploded. Winds pushed flames to a third tank, which exploded just before midnight Monday.

Smoke rose at least 3,600 feet and could be seen throughout the valley, home to 17 million people. Huge globes of fire shot up during the night and well into yesterday.

Firefighters and Red Cross ambulances rushed to the scene, snarling traffic for hours. About 300 police from Mexico City and neighboring Mexico state cordoned off the area.

Despite predictions of pollution problems, Mexico City environmental officials said readings were not unusually high yesterday.

The explosion happened about a mile from the site of a 1984 natural gas explosion at a Pemex tank complex that killed 503 people and injured some 4,250.

Pemex paid more than $4 million in compensation to 2,100 people who lost property, were injured or lost family members. The state government paid about $3.7 million to rebuild the suburb of 200,000 people and to compensate victims. Monday's incident was the second serious Pemex fire since July.

The Cactus natural gas processing plant in the southern state of Chiapas caught fire July 26, killing seven workers and causing an estimated $200 million in damages. Human error was blamed for that accident.

HOROSCOPES

ARIES
March 21–April 20
If you fall in love this week, it'll be for keeps, so take a close look at the object of your affection before giving your heart away. If you're considering a major purchase, now would be a good time to bite the bullet and make a down payment.

TAURUS
April 21–May 21
An old dream gains new life this week with the return of someone from your past. Take them outside for some R&R and some quality time. You'll both appreciate the opportunity to catch up on past events. Gather all the information before offering your opinion.

GEMINI
May 22–June 21
Don't allow yourself to be distracted from a big decision. The time to act is now. A negative trend reverses itself, bringing new insight into another's behavior. Trust the judgment of an expert when it comes to your finances.

CANCER
June 22–July 22
To turn a dreary day into a happy one, try anticipating the needs of another person. Your thoughtful gesture could be the start of a new or renewed friendship. A romantic relationship flourishes in silence—nonverbal communication carries the moment.

LEO
July 23–August 23
Break out of an old rut, and you could find renewed enthusiasm for a whole range of activities throughout your life. Lean on an old friend if you're feeling unsure or insecure. But don't ask for advice—the answer to your question is closer than you think.

VIRGO
August 24–September 22
It's a good time to plan a social event. Your personality is at its most magnetic, and you could end up drawing a dynamite crowd. Avoid taking center stage at work, however. The wrong people could be watching.

LIBRA
September 23–October 23
An outdoor event turns into an adventure. To help things turn out for the best, try planning further ahead than usual. Catch up on your exercise. You could use a little extra energy in the near future, and physical activity will help you find it.

SCORPIO
October 24–November 22
Start an anti-stress campaign to relieve tension at home. Just a little bit of relaxation will make a big difference. But remember—change begins with you. If you want to change your lifestyle, it's best to do one thing at a time, instead of several.

SAGITTARIUS
November 23–December 21
To add zest to your social life, consider adding a new activity or hobby to your calendar. You could discover a new passion. Don't be afraid of failure. Just learn from your mistakes, and you can't lose.

CAPRICORN
December 22–January 20
An athletic activity reaps great benefits for you—both physically and socially. Turn your energies to a project that's been on hold for awhile. Then, treat yourself to something really indulgent—a bubble bath or a gourmet dinner.

AQUARIUS
January 21–February 18
Although a situation might seem hopeless, channel your feelings of frustration into a positive effort for change. You could be surprised at the results. A loved one has a pleasant surprise—if you're not too distracted to listen to them.

PISCES
February 19–March 20
Avoid the temptation to be a couch potato—there's too much going on. You're exceptionally ripe for learning experiences, so go out and try something new. You could discover a real talent. A little privacy also helps you renew your energies in time for a distasteful situation.

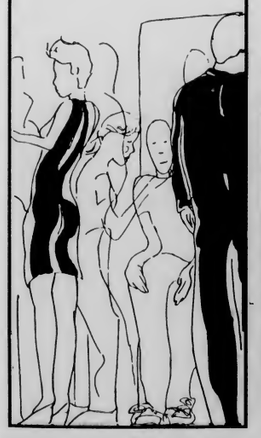
When I would go to a party I'd get very nervous that no one would want to talk to me..... which would make me even more nervous.



So I would sit by myself terrified that I looked lonely and uninteresting.

But after a while a friend came over and sat with me. Whew, relieved! I reminded him that I owed him some money and that I would pay him a dollar right now.

Pretty soon a girl came over to talk to him. Then a girl came over to talk to the first girl. After a while I was surrounded by people.

I started to feel anxious and slipped over to a quiet dark corner where no one would bother me.

I felt a little lonely and miserable, and.... I lost a dollar.

UM advances to NCAA Field Hockey Tournament

Victory over No. 15 Ball State extends season

THANG VO / COLLEGIAN

Kyle Rothenberger and the Minutewomen are on their way to the NCAA tournament, thanks to their 2–1 defeat of Ball State

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

WESTFIELD — After the Massachusetts field hockey team beat Westfield at Westfield State College to open its season, senior Kyle Rothenberger said that one of the team's goals for the year was to make the NCAA Tournament.

Yesterday, the Minutewomen did just that.

Rothenberger sparked UMass, scoring the game winner in UMass' 2–1 victory over No. 15 Ball State at Westfield State. By virtue of the win in this play–in game, the No. 9 Minutewomen (17–5) receive an automatic bid into the 12– team NCAA Tournament field.

Ball State	1

"I did not think we could lose this game and get in [to the NCAA's]," UMass coach Pam Hixon said. "It was a must win."

Rothenberger agreed.

"It was very important for our confidence and for taking the next step," Rothenberger said. "We knew we had to come in here very focused."

The Minutewomen took an early lead when Erica Johnston notched the game's first goal with 28:51 remaining before half–time.

Courtney MacLean fed Johnston from the wing, and the sophomore forward beat BSU goalie Angela Dello Russo, giving UMass a 1–0 lead.

The Cardinals tied the game with just 12 minutes left before intermission, when Melanie Herkins notched Ball State's only goal of the afternoon.

Herkins picked up the loose ball after a Cardinal teammate had knocked it into the circle on a free hit, and worked it past UMass netminder Hilary Rose, low to Rose's left side.

UMass had a chance to net a go–ahead goal on a penalty corner with 8:30 left in the half, but Laura Phelan's shot, after a designed fake, did not connect.

The Minutewomen, however, did not have to wait long for a go–ahead tally as Phelan passed to Rothenberger, who carried the ball into the Ball State circle.

When she realized no Cardinal defenders were coming out to challenge her, Rothenberger unleashed a shot that hit the Ball State bullseye with 7:19 remaining in the half.

"I rarely shoot off the dribble," Rothenberger said. "But for some reason, I carried it to my left and I looked up, and no one came to me. I saw the open corner, so I took it."

UMass turned up the pressure in the second half, allowing Ball State just one penalty corner after intermission period.

"In the second half we changed the position of our forwards so [Ball State] could only go in one direction when they got the ball," Hixon said.

"It really made a difference in taking away the ball."

The Minutewoman front line also stepped up, as it nearly added to the UMass lead just two minutes into the half.

Saskia Fuchs worked the ball into the circle twice within a minute, but the Cardinal defense would not allow her or Johnston to finish the attack.

UMass also had a chance to score again on a penalty corner with just over 24 minutes remaining in the game. Rothenberger took the initial hit, but sent the ball wide of the BSU cage by inches, and Kate Putnam was not able to reach the ball in time to deflect it.

Kerry Lyons, who saw several minutes of action off the bench in spelling MacLean, had a point blank shot with just under 20 minutes left in the contest, but Dello Russo was able to thwart her attempt.

Ball State coach Karen Fitzpatrick was impressed with UMass, as they were able to shut down one of the Cardinals strengths.

"They are obviously a very good team," Fitzpatrick said. "They played on some weaknesses we had that I thought did an excellent job taking away our passing game."

At the end of the day, the Minutewomen held more than enough advantage over the Cardinals in overall play.

UMass outshot BSU by a 15–5 margin, and posted a 12–5 difference in penalty corners. Rose finished up with two saves, while Dello Russo made four saves on the day.

The Minutewomen now play the waiting game. The seeds for the Tournament will be announced this afternoon, with first and second round action taking place this weekend at regional sites.

UMass loses battle between U.S. & Russia

By Fred Hurlbrink, Jr.
Collegian Staff

Who said the Cold War was over?

Peace time or not, the Massachusetts women's basketball team — representing the Stars and Stripes — did battle with Russia's Dinamo Novosibirsk squad last night falling 73–54 to their fellow world–power representatives.

Dinamo	73
Massachusetts	54

"I thought, in the first half we did a good job," University of Massachusetts head coach Joanie O'Brien said. "In the second, they may have made some adjustments. We got lost on defense, and they got a lot of open shots."

UMass succumbed to a superior second–half performance by the Russians, in which Dinamo outscored the Minutewomen 52–29. Dinamo used two big offensive outbursts after the break to secure the victory, including a 19–5 run to end the contest.

After a breakaway bucket by Jaywana Bradley that drew the Minutewomen to within seven at 54–47 with 5:24 to go, Coach O'Brien called a time–out tc rally her resurgent troops.

But, after that break in action, the aforementioned 19–5 Russian bombing occurred, quickly putting to rest any hopes of a UMass rally.

In that final five–minute span, Russian sharp–shooter Eugenia Simonova hit three triples to effectively seal the deal. Simonova had 17 points on the night on 5–for–10 shooting, with a 5–for–8 showing from beyond the arc.

Recovering from a sloppy first few minutes of action, the Minutewomen came out of half time with a 25–21 lead over Dinamo, but the Russians tied the game at 28 on an Ekaterina Dvorskia jumper just under three minutes into the second half.

The 6–foot–6 Dinamo reserve center was a force throughout as she completely out–sized and out–powered all the Minutewomen underneath. Dvorskia finished with 13 points and five rebounds in just 17 minutes of action — she also tallied five fouls, and was in and out of the lineup.

Fellow giant, Olga Tohurilova (6–foot–4) posted game highs with 19 points (on 8–for–12 shooting) nine rebounds and six assists. She also blocked two shots and had one of 16 Dinamo steals on the night.

The Minutewomen were led inside by Crystal Carroll who still looks rusty, but managed to get the job done, out– hustling her Russian counterparts for the majority of the contest.

"I really don't think I pushed myself enough — to the point of really being tired," Carroll said. "I'm trying to figure things out. I have to step up, and want to take [the big shot]."

Carroll — recently named to the pre–season All–Atlantic 10 second team — collected a team–high 16 points in 35 minutes of action. The

UMass swims to victory; Frosh duo performs well

By Chris Krein
Collegian Staff

To say the Massachusetts women's swimming and diving team's schedule was thrown off track would be an understatement. However, the Minutewomen were able to regroup from a rare cancellation and come out strong for Monday's dual meet against Northeastern. They brought home a 168–130 triumph, while raising their record to 2–1 on the young season.

The Minutewomen were set to square off against Providence College on Saturday, but due to health reasons for the Friar swimmers, the meet had to be rescheduled for Sunday, Jan. 12 at 2:00 p.m.

Instead, the University of Massachusetts had to shift its focus to the Northeastern Huskies for a Veteran's Day showdown in Boston.

The Minutewomen were led by freshman sensation Lia Lansky and anchored by veteran co–captain Barbara Hickey. Both swimmers rocketed through their events, placing times on the all–time UMass record board.

The team began the meet with a victory in the 200 medley relay, as Meghan Matacera, Jodi Walters, Andrea Spencer and Marci Hupp swam to a 1:55.94 victory.

The team continued its roll taking the top three spots in the next event, the 1000 freestyle. Hickey easily claimed first place with a blistering 10:44.95, ranking her seventh fastest in school history. Following her were Julie Alexander (11:01.37) and Shana Strothers (11:27.51), setting the stage for UMass dominance throughout the remainder of the day.

Head coach Bob Newcomb was especially pleased with with the one–two freshman performances delivered by Lansky and Spencer in the two butterfly races.

"Lia Lansky is swimming very well. She also set a personal best in the 400 IM (4:43.80, a first–place finish good for seventh place in the UMass record books)" he said. "With Andrea Spencer, they form a great double punch."

In the sixth race of the day, Lansky outdistanced her competition by almost four seconds in the 200 fly. Her time of 2:10.86 is the fifth fastest of all–time for any Minutewoman swimmer. Spencer touched second in 2:14.22, while Tricia Argentina secured third–place points with a time of 2:19.95.

The aquatic double duo wasn't finished however, coming back in the 100 fly to duel for top honors once again. Lansky prevailed in 1:01.29, while Spencer was less than a second behind at 1:01.61.

While Lansky was the day's only triple winner, Hickey nailed a double with a first place swim in the 500 free (5:18.55), following her 1000 free blow–out.

Other UMass victories included senior Jessica Farley in the 200 free (2:00.22) and sophomore Alexander in the 200 breast (2:34.02).

The women's swimming and diving team now will spend this week preparing for a return trip to Boston, as they get ready to face the Boston University Terriers in a 1 p.m. dual meet this Saturday.

Cowboys beat 49ers, head to GB; Pats possibly pondering playoffs?

JACOB W. MICHAELS on the NFL

And in a fantastic overtime match, Dallas beat San Francisco 20–17 last Sunday to win Super Bowl XXXI.

Or not. The match that has been dubbed the "real Super Bowl" for the last few years has come and gone with barely any more attention than last week's New England–Miami match or the Kansas City–Denver brouhaha.

Suddenly, it's not the game that will decide who wins the NFC Championship, and therefore the NFL Championship, but just another Week 11 game.

The main reason for the lack of emphasis on the game is the emergence of the Green Bay Packers. After being beat during the playoffs last year at 3Com Park and on a Monday night in mid–October by the Packers, the media has written off the red and gold.

This year, the "real Super Bowl" in this Monday as Green Bay invades Dallas to once again try to dethrone the Cowboys.

Or, so they say. Then again, they said the same thing last year when San Francisco beat Dallas, and they didn't win a single playoff game.

The winner of Green Bay–San Francisco, Dallas–San Francisco or Dallas–Green Bay is hardly a lock to win the whole thin, despite what various pundits say.

Dallas is still struggling to just reach the playoffs. After having problems early in the season due to injuries and no Michael Irvin, the Cowboys are 6–4 and are third in the division. They also still have two games with the Redskins (who are 7–3 and beat them twice last year) the Patriots, and, of course, Green Bay.

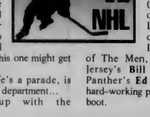
San Francisco is doing better with a 7–3 record, but have big problems with their offense, starting with their quarterbacks. Steve Young has tallied more concussions and groin pulls this year than touchdowns and while Elvis Grbac did well early in the season, he's had back spasms this season, and struggled against Dallas.

With WRs Robert Brooks and Antonio Freemen and TE Mark Chmura out with injuries, Brett Favre is running out of people to throw the ball to. While Don Beebe and Anthony Morgan should take up some of the slack, it will take a while for the team to get back in synch.

With all the troubles these three teams are having, there's plenty of room for an upset–minded Philadelphia, Washington or Carolina to come in and end up representing the conference in New Orleans.

Even then, though, it's not a given that the NFC will extend their Super Bowl winning streak. In past years the two conferences have had relatively the same luck against each other, with only the top NFC teams showing clear superiority over their AFC counterparts. The weaker teams in the conference tended to lose to the weaker AFC teams. Now, though, the top NFC teams have become weaker while the AFC's top teams are, if not getting stronger, at least not losing ground.

The last week is a prime example, as the AFC beat the NFC in six of seven games. The one loss for the AFC was dealt to the Raiders by the "powerhouse" Buccaneers.



The wins, however, were possible Super Bowl previews, as some of the AFC's best beat the NFC's best.

In Philadelphia, the Eagles finally lost their winning touch, as the Buffalo Bills came in and ended their four–game winning streak. It was Kansas City, just second place in their division, who dealt the Packers their second loss of the season in convincing fashion. Minnesota, who

Broad Street Bullies bring back brawls

My co–columnist Leigh Torbin did an admirable job last week playing the point on the power play that is this NHL column. But the wily veteran with the razor–like elbows is back on the ice, and I ain't talking about Gordie Howe. Even I wouldn't play for Hartford. Keep your heads up, all of you pucksters, this one might get a little dirty:

• From the "life's a parade, is everybody happy?" department…

What was up with the Flyers–Maple Leafs game on Sunday night? It was not a wild thing to see my pick for Lord Stanley's punch bowl, Philadelphia, come out with a 3– 1 victory, powered by former Vermont star John LeClair's two goals (10 goals, 8 assists on the season). LeClair is The Man of the Atlantic Division, if not one of The Men, along with New Jersey's Bill Guerin and the Panther's Ed Jovanoski. Good hard–working players, with skills to boot.

What was a wild thing was the Punch Bowl that happened at the end of it, where all 10 players on the ice squared off to give each other early season's greetings.

Listen up all you PC–er's. I do not condone violence. I do not choose physical conflict over peaceful, calm resolution when encountered with a similar situation… in everyday life. Hockey is a sport where life is led by the fine line between beauty and beast. But when the game begins to exceed fever pitch, the boys start to get feisty, and when I see the gloves fly, I get chills up and down my

Cancelled trip may indicate deal near

HEBRON, West Bank (AP) — In a sign that agreement on a Hebron troop pullback may be near, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu canceled a trip to the United States yesterday after meeting with top Palestinian negotiators.

The level of talks was upgraded yesterday when Netanyahu met in his office with Yasser Arafat's deputy Mahmoud Abbas. Netanyahu said in a statement afterward that he was canceling his trip "to assist in advancing the negotiations in these sensitive stages." Netanyahu had said he would only cancel his planned six–day trip to New York, Seattle and Los Angeles if an agreement to withdraw most Israeli troops from Hebron was imminent.

President Clinton's special Mideast envoy, Dennis Ross, also was flying to Tel Aviv from Cairo, where he had attended a Mideast economic conference, said U.S. State Department spokesman Nicolas Burns. Ross left Israel last month after failing to clinch a Hebron deal, saying then he would return when there were real prospects for an agreement.

In Hebron, Israeli troops continued preparing for a pullback, reinforcing their positions around Jewish settler enclaves with bulletproof watch towers.

Grand jury's ruling causes more shooting

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla. (AP) — A police officer was shot in the leg yesterday and dozens of gunshots were fired in the neighborhood where rioting broke out last month after a white police officer fatally shot a black motorist.

The shooting yesterday evening happened hours after a grand jury ruled the officer was justified in last month's shooting.

"We're trying to get control of this as quickly as we can," police spokesman Bill Doniel said. He said the officer was being treated at a local hospital, and his wounds were not life–threatening.

At least two dozen squad cars screeched out of police headquarters at the first report of the shooting. The streets were immediately blocked off, and moments later dozens of gunshots were heard. There were shouts of "Get down, get down," and tear gas filled the area.

The officer was shot in front of a house where members of a black separatist group, the National People's Democratic Uhuru Movement, meet. The group has called for the executions of the police officers involved in last month's shooting.

The group handed out fliers yesterday afternoon, after the grand jury ruling, promoting a 6:30 p.m. community meeting. The shooting occurred shortly before the meeting was to have taken place. "KILLER COP GOES FREE," the flier read. "We will not be shot down in the streets like dogs. Neither will we be pushed into jails for defending our community… GET ORGANIZED!"

Police investigating acquaintance rape alleged in Southwest

By Laura Stock
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts Police reported yesterday that an alleged acquaintance rape occurred in Southwest Residential Area last Sunday.

According to police sources, the victim, who is a female UMass student, reported that she was raped in a residence hall.

"We are still having conversations with the victim and conferring with the District Attorney," said John Luippold, UMass chief of police.

Luippold also said that the Community Disorders Unit detectives are still investigating the incident.

The incident, though reported Sunday, was not made public until police had more than one conversation with the victim to discuss her options, Luippold said.

No further information about the victim or suspect is available, as the investigation is ongoing.

Students concerned about incidents of rape on campus can also turn to the Everywoman's Center, which is located in Nelson House.

The Everywoman's Center's Counselor/Advocate program offers services dealing specifically with crisis intervention. A 24–hour hotline, staffed by peer counselors, is available to all students.

According to Rachel Thorburn, the assistant coordinator of the Counsellor/Advocate Program, the hotline is available to victims, as well as family and friends.

The Everywoman's Center also provides medical and legal referrals, short–term counselling and support groups for survivors.

"Counsellors provide legal and medical advocacy," Thorburn said. "We can meet a victim at the hospital or at the police station and help them."

In addition to the victim considering filing police reports and having a medical exam, Thorburn said there are additional concerns for women who have been acquaintance raped.

"Something to be concerned about might be obtaining a restraining order, if he [the attacker] was someone she was dating, which you get through the police," Thorburn said

Senate approves plan to reduce bureaucracy

By Raghuram Vadarevu
Collegian Staff

By the time the class of 2000 leaves the University of Massachusetts, they may have at least one semester in which they no longer have to deal with long lines at the Registrar's, Bursar's or Financial Aid offices.

In a unanimous decision last night, the Undergraduate Student Senate passed a motion demanding Chancellor David K. Scott adopt the Student Government Association's (SGA) plan to eliminate bureaucracy within the campus administration.

The motion requires the Chancellor to add the plan to his Strategic Action Plan which works to improve the entire campus.

The administration, specifically student services, have been recognized by the University's Board of Trustees, President's Office and Pappas Consulting Firm as an area "in critical need of reorganization," stated the motion.

The plan, titled Administrative Redesign (ARD), would create a "one–stop" resource center in Whitmore Administration building. The center will have a staff trained in issues ranging from financial aid to semester bill clearing, said Sean Carter, student Trustee for the University's Amherst campus.

The ARD plan may save the University and students $4 million over a five year period, said Carter.

According to the trustee, the plan will allow students more time to work on problems in class and not the problems created by Whitmore.

In October, a similar "one–stop" resource center plan was implemented at the University's Dartmouth campus and has received lukewarm reviews, said Carter.

However, the plan to be implemented in Amherst has an advantage, according to Carter, because this campus has two to three years to plan the redesign.

The plan also includes the creation of a campus– and University–wide computer network that will facilitate semester bill clearing and will ensure housing assignments. Carter said the system will help eliminate housing problems associated with late payment of semester bills.

The plan said "[the network will] push housing to inform incoming students of their room assignments and roommates two weeks before move–in."

According to Carter, who is also a resident assistant, the plan will help in avoiding cases where a large number of students were left without housing when the Bursar's Office lost payment records last year.

In addition, the plan mandates that University Health Services be connected to the University–wide computer network so students will have their health insurance as soon as their semester bill clears.

As a consequence, Carter said, students won't have to worry about being placed in a health emergency and not having health insurance because their bills did not clear.

"The ARD provides a great opportunity for students to counteract the bureaucracy that exists on campus," said Sen. Scott Croshier, the Orchard Hill Area Government representative to the Senate and sponsor of the motion.

The plan also covers Auxiliary Services. It calls for the development of an "all–campus" card which will allow students to obtain food at any of the University's Dining Commons and Munchy Stores and student–run businesses such as Earth Foods.

The plan also pushes for the implementation of the "Procard." The Procard would allow Registered Student Organizations to use it like a credit card to make purchases, instead of having to use purchase orders.

According to Carter, the Procard will save money from the Student Activities Trust Fund because it will eliminate the bureaucratic procedure of filing purchase orders that cost about $130 each.

Shihadeh performs her life story

A Palestinian perspective, conveyed though the art of story telling

ELIZABETH BROWN / COLLEGIAN

Emily Shihadeh performed Tuesday night in the Campus Center.

"When I returned to Ramallah, it looked so peaceful as if there were no occupation, no uprising, and no bitterness," said Emily Shihadeh serenely.

Performance artist, story teller and public speaker, Shihadeh performed on Tuesday night in the Campus Center, in a one woman play titled, Grapes and Figs are in Season: A Palestinian Women's Story.

Directed by Victoria Rue and accompanied by guitarist Claude Palmer, the event was arranged by the University of Massachusetts Women's Studies department and others.

An American of Palestinian Quaker heritage, Shihadeh was born in Jerusalem in 1941. At the age of seven she and her family were forced to abandon their home due to fighting in the area between Israelis and Palestinians. Her home in Jerusalem went under Israeli rule, as they drove miles north to Ramallah, Jordan (now part of the Israeli–occupied West Bank).

Shihadeh told her life story, combining the growing pains of childhood, adolescence, marriage and divorce while juxtaposing these anecdotes with the Israeli occupation of Palestine.

"Ramallah means the hill of god, when I went back I saw the graffiti on the walls… 'In memory of our martyrs,' 'Down with the occupation,' and 'long live the uprising.' The city was empty, there were burnt tires, I couldn't believe it was Ramallah."

She retold a conversation she had with a townsman, who asked her if she remembered her Arabic, to which she replied, 'I remember Arabic. I remember my country.'

"Funny how the world has forgotten the Palestinians. But enjoy, grapes and figs are in season," said the man.

Shihadeh grew up in a household where her parents were constantly at odds, communicating only through the game of backgammon; the angrier they were, the harder they threw the dice and moved their pieces.

Her mother was a teacher, educated in Beirut, and her father was an Army doctor, who made sure that his daughters received a well–rounded education.

For Shihadeh, the middle child of five girls, her family was "a lucky group of strangers, with no warmth, no holding and no touching."

She relived various years of her life, visiting her mother in 1989, having a childhood crush in 1956 at the age of 15, and a family reunion in 1970 where for the first time in 20 years all of her sisters were together, and later, the death of her father.

She described her family reunion in 1970 where all five sisters were present. One later became the first woman producer/director of Jordan; another, Noelle, was hospitalized for Schizophrenia.

"Noelle, they tell me you go yell at the Israeli soldiers, as they pass by in their jeeps, 'Get out of Ramallah, get out of Ramallah!'" she said.

Her youngest sister developed breast cancer, and had to go to Israeli doctors for treatment. She spoke on how she had talked to ministers planning for her funeral.

"…are you playing guitar in heaven?" asked Shihadeh to her sister.

Recalling the first time she came to America, after her marriage at 17, she said that on the plane, they all called

Class addresses black–Jewish relations

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

A Social Justice education course focusing on Afro–Judiac relationships was conducted during a three–day retreat at Bullard Farm in New Salem.

"African American and Jewish students in dialogue" was facilitated by Warren Blumenfeld and Lisa Robinson, both UMass doctoral students.

Blumenfeld and Robinson designed the two–credit course after conducting a survey as part of a class assignment. The survey results concluded that black–Jewish relations were problematic on campus.

Blumenfeld said the weekend "surpassed my expectations," and many participants left the workshop "feeling ambivalent about the weekend ending," wanting to continue discussion on campus.

"Overall I think everyone had a positive experience," said Robinson.

She said that although many students were not sure what to expect before the weekend, "the students really clicked from the beginning.

"I was particularly pleased with the amount of respect people showed for one another. Although we didn't always agree there was never a point when there was a lack of respect for one another," she said.

Blumenfeld said that the group did not come together to agree with each other in the end; rather, the intention was to gain a better understanding of being blacks and Jews in the United States.

Sociology major Jeff Hirschberg, one of the 17 students to participate in the course found the weekend, "very productive and positive."

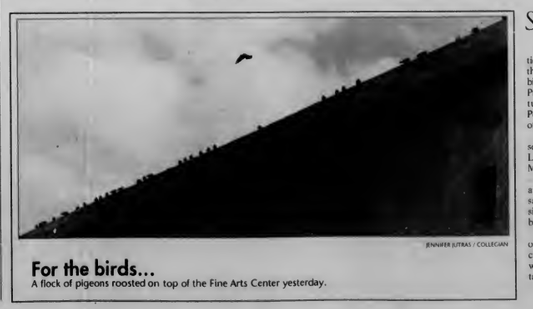
Hirschberg said, "I learned a lot about the many differences between African Americans and Jewish students but I also learned a lot about common issues that we share."

Hirschberg said although he found the workshop beneficial, the most "productive time was at night when everyone hung out together," because students got to talk and know each other on a different level.

Sophomore Tanisha Kimber said when she signed up for the course she was not aware of any problems between African American and Jewish students.

"I went with a very open mind. We got to hear both sides of the story and understand and relate to each other," said Kimber.

Although Kimber did not know what to expect, senior Judith Aquino said she was nervous about attending the workshop.



"I thought there was going to be yelling and arguing between the two groups, but it wasn't like that at all," said Aquino.

Aquino said the she learned a lot about the Jewish community. "I knew some things about Jewish people but not a lot. I was able to educate myself about their culture, holidays and why they do certain things."

She also added that as a result of the course, "we are becoming allies on campus to help solve problems that arise between our groups."

All participants agreed more edu–

States may not be equal in House

The current formula used to apportion the number of seats per state in the U.S. House of Representatives is biased in favor of smaller states, said Professor Melvin Jankowitz in his lecture "Mathematics Collides with Politics: Apportionment of the House of Representatives."

The lecture was the second this semester in the Distinguished Faculty Lecture Series and was held in Memorial Hall.

Jankowitz, a mathematics professor at the University of Massachusetts, said that the various methods used since the 2nd Congress in 1792 have been influenced by politics.

According to Jankowitz, regardless of the "flowery mathematics," politicians believe "the bottom–line is that I want another seat, and I am going to take it from you."

Each state's number of seats in the House is assigned by population based on a census taken every 10 years, with at least 30,000 people represented by one seat. Each state must have at least one representative. There are 435 seats in the House.

Although the current method, known as Huntington–Hill method, functions adequately, Jankowitz said there are superior alternatives. He estimated the Huntington–Hill formula had a 5 percent bias towards smaller states.

He explained the history of the current method — Alexander Hamilton first passed a system in 1792. President George Washington, however, vetoed the bill to pass Thomas Jefferson's plan, which gave their native Virginia an extra state.

"I suspect the bottom–line is that Virginia gets the extra seat," said Jankowitz.

her Fatima.

"Americans think all Arab women are called Fatima and all Arab men are named Muhammed," said Shihadeh.

She spoke about how Americans don't understand who Arabs are, relating experiences where during the Six–Day War when Israel occupied the West Bank, Americans were celebrating while her family and town was under occupation.

Shihadeh spoke of the colonization which has occurred in Palestinian history — first by the British then by the Israelis.

"The British were in our country... they were in everybody's country. It was as if they had amnesia, they would give countries they had to other countries. When they drew the map of Jordan there was a bump in the line, when asked how it got there, they replied that Churchill hiccuped."

Ramallah kept changing names, said Shihadeh, being colonized by the Turks, English and Israelis. It was Ramallah, Palestine; Ramallah, Jordan; Ramallah, West Bank; Ramallah, Occupied territory.

She remembered an incident where an American asked her where she was from, when she replied that she was Palestinian, he said, "There's no [expletive] Palestine on the map," to which she replied, "we're [expletive] Palestinian."

Returning once more to a recent visit to see her mother, she said goodbye and added, "I'm leaving to be searched to death at the Israeli Airport because I'm Palestinian. I'll be here next year. Maybe, mama, next year grapes and figs will be in season. Maybe, mama, we'll have a Palestinian state. Maybe, mama, it will be Ramallah, Palestine."

Shihadeh entertained questions from the audience after her performance. She said that she wanted to tell people in American about the humanity of Palestinians, that she hears so little of the Palestinian side of the story.

"Not all Arabs are terrorists; some people act in terrorist ways because of the circumstances," said Shihadeh.

cational workshops and course need to be offered.

"I would like to hold another course like this sometime next fall," said Blumenfeld. "Perhaps some returning students will come and share their experiences."

Both facilitators feel that more dialogue needs to take place at UMass between different groups represented on campus.

Robinson said, "We need to have more dialogues like this on campus, not just between African American and Jewish students but between other groups with different ethnic and religious backgrounds as well as men and women."

On Dec. 8, the participants will meet at a local restaurant for a debriefing session.

"We will continue to plan activities to bring our knowledge and experiences back to campus." said Blumenfeld.

The Chancellor's Commission on Civility, which has since been joined with the Chancellor's Multicultural Advisory Board, gave the facilitators a $1,500 grant for the course.

Prof: S. African reforms continuing

By Laura Forster
Collegian Staff

At a political crossroads, much of the euphoria surrounding the passage of a new South African constitution this past May is gone, leaving many to question the fate of the country.

In a discussion entitled, "Democracy and Social Change," Penelope Andrews, professor of law at the City University of New York Law School, said much remains in terms of questions about South Africa's future, but there is reason to be optimistic.

"It's a miracle — the transformation and development that South Africa has experienced since 1990 when Nelson Mandela was released from prison."

Andrews, who is from South Africa, was accompanied by two CUNY law students who recently completed internships in South Africa, Roberta Chambers and Mary Marrow.

The new constitution, said Andrews, includes a comprehensive Bill of Rights, which includes guarantees to housing, clean water and an education, among other things.

When asked what the future holds for South Africa once Nelson Mandela leaves the Presidency, Andrews said that although Mandela is an impressive moral leader, the importance of the African National Congress in maintaining stability as a whole should not be overlooked.

The party is already responsible, Andrews said, for the idea of proportional representation which allows for smaller parties to have a voice; as well as a government of national unity to incorporate a range of interests.

One student questioned where the citizens' loyalties now lay between the now estranged Winnie and Nelson Mandela. Andrews said that this was not a focus right now within the country. Instead, Andrews said that the country's focus has been on the work of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission and uncovering the government–backed crimes of the Apartheid era.

All three women spoke on the difficulty which the new government is now facing as it tries to determine which step to take first towards a long term plan of development.

Marrow said some of the issues seem very simple.

"Which is more important, shelter or clean water," she asked.

Andrews said many problems exist in transforming "South Africa from an European colony in Africa to an African colony in Africa."

The lecture was sponsored by the program in social thought and political economy.

MHC to host anti–homophobia rally

Tonight at Mount Holyoke College a rally will be held to help combat the fight against homophobia. Sponsored by the Mt. Holyoke Lesbian, Bisexual, Alliance (LBA) the rally will begin at 8 p.m.

Marchers will congregate for the rally at the front gates of the Mt. Holyoke campus. They will then walk on campus to Blanchard Hall, where there will be speakers, an open microphone session, and a candlelight vigil.

Speaking at the rally will be Joanna Creighton, the president of Mt. Holyoke. Joining Creighton will be other speakers from various outlets on and off the Mt. Holyoke campus.

There will be an opportunity for participants in the march to speak about their experiences or just on behalf of their friends or family. The open microphone allows the marchers to express their thoughts on homophobia and how it affects them.

The rally will then march to Mary Lyon's grave in front of the library. Lyon was an American educator who founded Mt. Holyoke as a seminary in the mid–nineteenth century.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is financially independent from the University of Massachusetts, operating solely on revenues generated by advertising sales. The paper was founded in 1890 as Aggie Life, became the College Signal in 1903, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and then the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1950. The laws that destroy

Krish Fournier

It all began on a humid, late summer night. You see, it was on this muggy evening that rage split my family into two opposing sides, and it was also when I realized a cold truth.

My brother was a mean, spiteful ingrate who had a thousand legal rights which gave him the power to destroy my family. My family and I were innocent victims at the mercy of a callous, spoiled brat. We were victimized by the very same system that is supposed to protect decent citizens like ourselves.

It was on this night that I discovered that the laws which govern our country are a satire of democracy. I am enraged that our government continues to uphold laws that torment the innocent.

On this pivotal evening, my brother took his bold teenage rebellion to a frightening level. In the midst of another shouting match, my brother defiantly struck my father. And in the blur of events that followed, my father struggled to defend himself without hurting his son. When the scuffle was over, my brother was issued an ultimatum: apologize or get the hell out. My brother was too proud to admit his mistake. With all the foolish spite he could muster, he tore out of our home forever.

In the midst of what should have been a very private family tragedy, the law intervened on behalf of my brother. With each outrageous invasion of our right to grieve in peace, the police stripped my family not only of our dignity, but also of our rights as citizens. Essentially, we had no rights. We had no voice or representation to defend ourselves in the face of an ungrateful boy empowered by foolish laws.

Following my brother's dramatic exit from our home, he filed false charges stating that he had been the victim of cruel treatment and physical abuse. In no way was my brother abused in our home! I know this with certainty because I was a witness to every incident that my brother claimed was abuse. The true irony is that the real victim of abuse in my home was my father. There had been incidents where my brother had pushed my father to the floor, as well as times when he had thrown furniture. Unfortunately, it was our word against my brother's, and the police took the side of the minor child.

One attending officer admitted to my mother that he believed my brother's claims were bogus, but there was nothing he could do to rectify the situation. The current laws concerning domestic abuse serve only one function: to protect the minor child. Sadly, as is documented on the news daily, children continue to die from abuse, while manipulative ingrates like my brother use these laws to extract revenge on their parents for false crimes. On the word of a lying boy, my father was stripped of his rights and regarded as a despicable criminal. He was served with a foolish restraining order, forced to surrender his hunting weapons and ordered to appear in court to defend himself against outlandish accusations. My poor father was trying to grieve for the loss of his son, as well as deal with such betrayal, but he was not allowed to heal. Instead, the law delayed his healing process by intensifying his distress and allowing my brother's circus act of petty revenge to continue.

My brother had no witnesses to corroborate his story. He had no physical marks or evidence of his alleged abuse. All he had was a big fat lie. My father, on the other hand, had a house full of witnesses who denied the alleged abuse, as well as terrible bruises on his arm where my brother had forcefully grabbed him. Yet, it was my brother who had all the rights. And my father had no rights. In the face of having no rights, my father was victimized by the law until he could prove his innocence.

In the meantime, my brother achieved his goal. He made us all suffer. His vehicle to ensure our suffering was our very own legal system.

It wasn't until my family was cruelly attacked by the legal system that I truly realized that there is no justice for the innocent. The law simply does not serve its intended purpose. It does not protect the common citizen. Rather, it permits spiteful citizens to abuse its power. Day after day, the police invaded our home on the whim of the ingrate. We waited with baited breath for my brother's continual vengeful attacks.

In the days of my brother's lawful attack, I observed the devastating toll his fury brought upon my family. I witnessed my mother fighting vehemently to secure us some basic rights. I saw my little sister cringe with fear when my brother boldly pranced into our home with a police escort to collect his belongings. And I saw my father cry silently, unable to comprehend his own son's betrayal, unable to fight any longer, because he had no means by which to fight. He was a strong, caring man who had been reduced to a hollow shell. The bulk of the blame can not lay on my brother's shoulders. Instead, I direct my disgust and blame onto the legal system, because during the most horrible week of our lives, it failed us.

One evening, in utter frustration, my mother asked an officer what the hell our rights were. She was tired of listening to my brother's long list of rights. The officer was silent for a moment as he shifted uncomfortably in his shoes.

"Well," the cop fumbled, "at this point, you and your husband don't have any rights."

Finally, someone had admitted what I had known the moment my brother began his petty game. There is a serious problem with our legal system. Because, you see, the guilty have rights and the innocent have none. So much for innocent until proven guilty.

Cable service a virtual monopoly

Bob Dunn

In the beginning there was television, and it was good.

What made it good was the fact that a bunch of frustrated novelists and playwrights who weren't seeing their work get published in print (remember print?) were being gobbled up by the networks to write for them because, after all, they needed something to run in between the advertisements.

Next came cable, and it was OK.

Cable, at first, was simply a way for rural areas to receive a clear television signal through use of the now-familiar cable instead of the unreliable and much more terrain and weather-sensitive antenna rig.

Now there's the "new technology." Digital, fiber-optic, stereo, satellite, multi-link, computerized, flat-tubed, platform viewing modules, and it blows.

Cable slithered its way into the households of America like the proverbial Biblical serpent, promising knowledge, delivering vice instead and swallowing us whole in the process.

Families once gathered in a big circle in the living room to watch a grainy, wobbly, black and white picture of a live performance of Requiem for a Heavyweight, or the GE College Bowl. Now, they'll rush into the TV room, tear apart the couch looking for the remote so they can turn on the matte-black centerpiece of the entertainment center for the privilege of being able to watch a digitally enhanced, crystal clear, prime-time rerun of Eddie and the Cruisers II, on "Unnecessary Sequel Theater."

It's not just that 98 percent of what's on cable is crap (it is) but that the 2 percent that remains may not be available to you due to some apparently arbitrary decision made by the unseen elite of the home entertainment industry — the cable company.

Ordinarily, an arbitrary decision made by a company is no problem. Don't like your service? Go somewhere else. Don't like AT&T? Switch to MCI. Don't like Big Macs? Eat Whoppers. Don't like your cable service? Well... you're stuck. There's only one per customer. Each area is subject to a monopoly and the service you're offered is the service you get. Case closed.

The company itself is no help either. Continental will charge you for each box, each remote, service, installation and monthly fee in order to keep your Magnavox humming. If you dare to ask about new or better channels, though, you're likely to feel a bit like a waif in Dickens' London asking for a second helping of gruel.

"Continental Uber-cable."

"Yeah, I was wondering about getting some new channels."

"Like what? We're really busy here."

"Oh, Comedy Central, ESPN2, TCM, CNNfn, THC, just to name a few."

"Awww. What's the matter? Don't like your channels, pal? Awww, that's too bad! You'll get nothing and like it, bub. Quit pestering us with your calls and be a good little zombie and watch Beastmaster again, would you? Maybe this time you'll convince yourself that Tanya Roberts can actually act. Of course, you can always use that other cable company, hahahaha! Oh by the way, rates are going up too. Happy viewing, chump!"

There doesn't seem to be any rhyme or reason to the placement of service, either. For example, how come the Amherst area is unable to receive ESPN2, when a great deal of college basketball games are broadcast on that very channel? I'm not sure if Cox Cable has heard, but we've got a nationally recognized college ball team right here at home. It might be nice to be able to catch a televised game once in a while.

It seems that the cable company can offer whatever drek they want to push out there and not have to be accountable to anyone for their choice of what's available. I don't expect any one company to provide everything, but there needs to be competition. There's no incentive to improve service or to offer good service to begin with if there's no one else out there.

When smaller companies convinced the courts that AT&T held a monopoly over long distance service, the courts broke them up and paved the way for long distance rates to drop to as low as 10 cents a minute, allowing companies to turn a profit and people to shop around for the plan that suits their needs the best. Everyone wins.

When it comes down to it, television is a service. At its best it can entertain, inform, educate and enlighten but it can only do that if access is given to what's available. Cable companies aren't doing it on their own and won't as long as they're allowed to maintain monopolies over their respective towns. Someone in charge needs to conclude the companies' broadcast day.

No average Joe

David K. Chan

Like most people in China during the 1960s, Joe grew up poor. His house was crowded with his four brothers and sisters. Growing up, Joe often dreamed about going to college and living a simple life with simple pleasures. He worked hard in school hoping to become an engineer, but schools in China were extremely competitive and not every deserving student was guaranteed a chance. But Joe's peers saw his talents when he built his first radio out of spare parts when he was only 10 years old.

During his high school years, with Joe's potential running high, China's cultural revolution was in full steam. The government began telling each citizen what to be. Joe was ordered to drop out of school and take up farming for the rest of his life. Joe's hopes and dreams were crushed. He farmed for about two years and realized that he had nothing worth striving for.

There was only one solution: Joe had to leave. He knew he had the guts to do so. Joe and two of his friends, one boy and one girl, planned to escape from China and go to Hong Kong where there was freedom and refuge. They couldn't tell anybody about their plan, not even their families for fear of the government finding out. If Joe had told his father, he would have gotten a good beating anyway.

The journey to the southern border of China was difficult and dangerous. Joe and his friends had to travel quietly at night through forests without flashlights, hoping that guards and policemen wouldn't see or hear them. Along the way, the girl got sick and the boy got lost, and they weren't even halfway through their journey. Joe had to continue alone.

After three straight days of walking with no food, Joe had reached China's shoreline. Quietly and cunningly, he had to creep to the shore without the border guards seeing him. When the low tide came, he swam for about three miles until he saw the lights of an island that he had never seen before — Hong Kong.

Now that Joe was in the British colony, he had to find a place to stay. Joe had never been away from home before. He had to rely on his courage and self-motivation because he was a stranger at the mercy of anybody he met. Anyone could've turned him in. There was no turning back, otherwise he would have been imprisoned for life.

Joe rented a dirty, tiny room in an old lady's broken down apartment. He was also able to find a job at a stationary factory. Joe forced himself to eat less and live poorly so that he could save up as much money as he could.

Curious about what happened to his two friends, Joe wrote back to China. He was informed that the two had secretly returned back to their homes that night. They had also attempted another escape a few days after, but sadly the girl drowned and the boy was caught and thrown into a labor camp.

Joe also wrote back to his family. He hadn't talked to them for almost a year. During his disappearance, government officials had gone to Joe's house to look for him. But his family had no idea where he was. Joe's mother actually went to a fortune teller to ask where he was. The fortune teller predicted that Joe was probably dead. She sobbed everyday until she received Joe's letter.

In the old apartment that Joe was living in, the old lady had a daughter about Joe's age. He was interested in her, but she wasn't interested in him. She knew that he was from China and, in Hong Kong, people from China had a bad reputation. But Joe was able to spend some time with this girl and he eventually won her heart. She saw that he was different. She saw that he worked hard, took action toward his goals and asked no favors. Joe was a man. He wasn't the typical refugee.

A year later, the two got married and had a baby boy. Joe loved his son and he suddenly had new dreams. Joe wanted to live in the United States. He wanted that simple American way of life. But more importantly, he wanted the best for his new family.

Joe quickly took up night classes to learn English. It was hard to keep up because of his lack of education, but his desire to learn kept him going. At the classes, he met a friend who also planned to move to America. This friend had a relative in the United States so he went first. He promised that he would help Joe as soon as he got there.

When Joe's family received their immigration papers, the baby was almost a year old. Again, Joe was a stranger in a strange land. But this time he had a family to support. With the help of his friend, Joe was able to find an apartment and a job in Boston. He worked at a Chinese restaurant. With his desire to improve his English, he would make conversation with people and learn from his mistakes.

After living in various apartments in Boston for several years, Joe finally bought a house in the suburb of Quincy. Joe had worked extremely hard again to save up money for this dream. It was only 10 years earlier that he had been ordered to be a farmer. While in Quincy, Joe and some of his friends decided to open their own restaurant together. Through hard work again, Joe saved enough money to own a share in the restaurant. Joe works as the bartender and host in his restaurant because of his good English. His friendly personality helped him to make many friends in his bar.

Now Joe is living his dream of the simple, satisfying life. If you see him, you'd probably call him a "Joe-average-guy." But what he's accomplished is quite an achievement compared to the life that he could've lived.

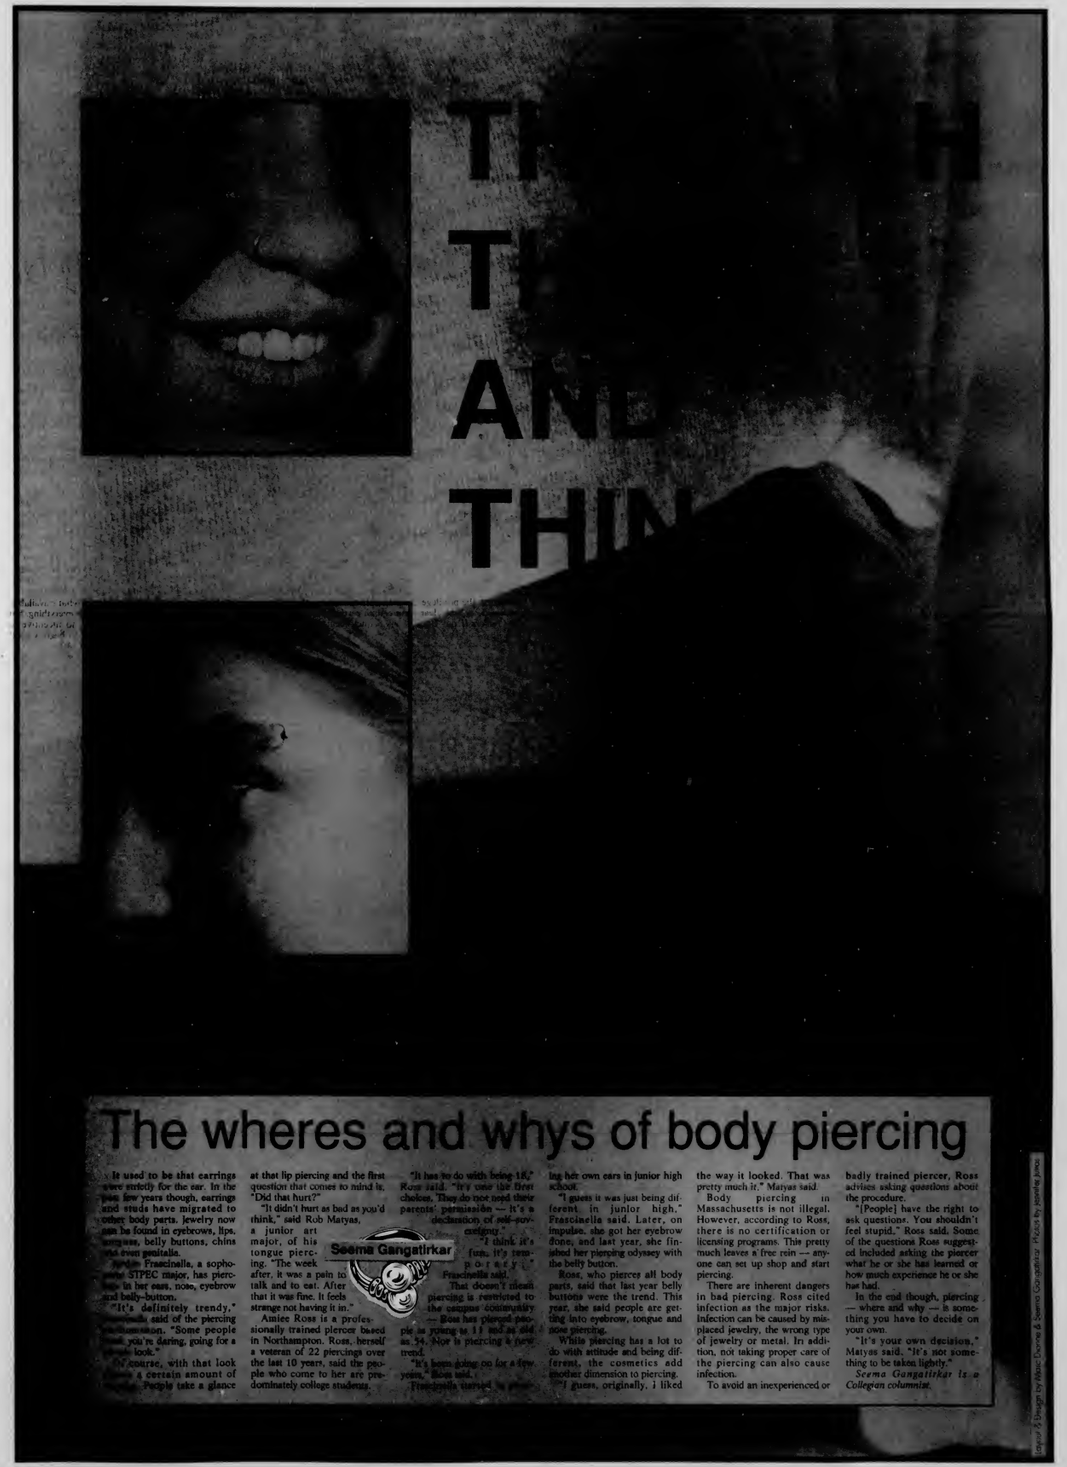
A few things to keep in mind

When thinking of getting any part of your body pierced, it's a good idea not to do it yourself.

Amiee Ross, a Northampton piercer, says that piercing yourself "is like playing with fire. Some people are luckier than others."

It's important to get your piercings done professionally by trained people who can tell you how to care for the piercing and how to avoid infections.



You should be sure to interview any piercer before the needle comes close to your skin. If any problems develop, be sure to consult with a doctor.

Some local piercers in the area:

- Piercings by the Bearded Lady. Located on State Street in Northampton. Call 586-0829 for more information or set up an appointment.
- The Edge Tattoo & Piercing Company. Located in Enfield, Conn., call (860) 741-3545.
- Parrot Piercing. Located in Northampton and temporarily closed. No phone number available at this time.
- Primitive Leather. Located in Northampton. Piercings are done on Sundays. Call 586-2097 for more information.

These are just a sampling of piercers in the area and should not be taken as Collegian recommendations.

The wheres and whys of body piercing

Seema Gangatirkar

It used to be that earrings were strictly for the ear. In the past few years though, earrings and studs have migrated to other body parts. Jewelry now can be found in eyebrows, lips, tongue, belly buttons, chins and even genitalia.

Franciella, a sophomore at STPEC major, has pierced in her ears, nose, eyebrow and belly-button.

"It's definitely trendy," she said of the piercing sensation. "Some people think you're daring, going for a certain look."

Of course, with that look comes a certain amount of pain. People take a glance at that lip piercing and the first question that comes to mind is, "Did that hurt?"

"It didn't hurt as bad as you'd think," said Rob Matyas, a junior art major, of his tongue piercing. "The week after, it was a pain to talk and to eat. After that it was fine. It feels strange not having it in."

Amiee Ross is a professionally trained piercer based in Northampton. Ross, herself a veteran of 22 piercings over the last 10 years, said the people who come to her are predominately college students.

"It has to do with being 18," Ross said. "It's one the first choices. They do not need their parents' permission — it's a declaration of self-sovereignty."

"I think it's fun. It's temporary," Franciella said.

That doesn't mean piercing is restricted to the college community — Ross has pierced people as young as 11 and as old as 54. Nor is piercing a new trend.

"It's been going on for a few years," Ross said.

Franciella started piercing her own ears in junior high school.

"I guess it was just being different in junior high," Franciella said. Later, on impulse, she got her eyebrow done, and last year, she finished her piercing odyssey with the belly button.

Ross, who pierces all body parts, said that last year belly buttons were the trend. This year, she said people are getting into eyebrow, tongue and nose piercing.

While piercing has a lot to do with attitude and being different, the cosmetics add another dimension to piercing.

"I guess, originally, I liked the way it looked. That was pretty much it," Matyas said.

Body piercing in Massachusetts is not illegal. However, according to Ross, there is no certification or licensing programs. This pretty much leaves a free rein — anyone can set up shop and start piercing.

There are inherent dangers in bad piercing. Ross cited infection as the major risks. Infection can be caused by misplaced jewelry, the wrong type of jewelry or metal. In addition, not taking proper care of the piercing can also cause infection.

To avoid an inexperienced or badly trained piercer, Ross advises asking questions about the procedure.

"[People] have the right to ask questions. You shouldn't feel stupid," Ross said. Some of the questions Ross suggested included asking the piercer what he or she has learned or how much experience he or she has had.

In the end though, piercing — where and why — is something you have to decide on your own.

"It's your own decision," Matyas said. "It's not something to be taken lightly."

New York based Mixed Company to explore bi-racial issues

By Seema Gangatirkar
Collegian Staff

Dance, in its purest form, is lyrical and graceful. With gentle movements and elegance, dance is a powerful medium to convey messages in a way that is easy to absorb and pleasurable at the same time.

Mixed Company, a new and innovative New York City based performance troupe will take the stage at Hampden Theater tomorrow night to explore the Asian American experience from a biracial perspective.

The powerful force of water, gymnastics and martial arts combine with stage combat to create "Islands: a hapa wet dream." This multimedia collaborative work has been described as "both striking in its athleticism and alluring in its aggressive sensuality," in the Asian/New Yorker. The performance begins at 8 p.m.

"Islands" was conceived and created by Vietnamese-Irish– American choreographer Maura Nguyen Donohoe. Donohoe, who was born in Saigon, Vietnam, explores the issues of a biracial community in her dance.

The Asian/New Yorker says that Donohoe "provides a lively new voice for both the Asian American Arts and modern dance community."

A leading member of the Asian American dance community, Donohoe is a member of Chen & Dancers, the nation's largest Asian American dance company.

Donohoe leads In Mixed Company, a new performance troupe dedicated to the art of "mixin' it up." "Islands" is the group's first full work.

Donohoe is a 1992 cum laude graduate of Smith College, where she graduated with a degree in anthropology and dance. At Smith, she directed Celebrations, a multicultural dance company for three years.

In Mixed Company is presented as part of the OFF Center Series. The OFF Center Series is funded in part by a grant from the New England Foundation for the Arts.

Tickets are $5 for Five College Students and $10 for the general public. Hampden Theater is located in the Hampden Dining Commons in the Southwest Residential Area on the University of Massachusetts campus. Parking is available for the physically challenged in lot 50 off Fearing Street.

The Heads perform without Byrne

By Panagiotis Gianopoulos
Collegian Staff

Everybody remembers the Talking Heads: a name that never really made sense. Their music was popular enough to be included in both good and bad movies (Revenge of the Nerds is your call), and had a feeling of dynamic energy mixed with experimental tendencies. It wasn't quite straight rock 'n' roll — it was everywhere.

Now, if you check the headline of this article you might notice a similarity in this band's name, specifically the absence of the adjective "Talking." The reason for this nominal jettisoning is simple: no David Byrne, no talking, no '80s, no yesterday. The Heads may be the three rhythm members of Talking Heads, but this band reunited has new songs and a wholly new sound. Inject your own "phoenix rising from the ashes" metaphor here and welcome the timely, spunky arrival of The Heads.

The members, Chris Frantz, Jerry Harrison and Tina Weymouth, have not been lying musically low in the past six years, but they've been doing more with music behind the stage than on stage. Harrison produced records for Live, Crash Test Dummies, and the Violent Femmes, while Weymouth and Frantz produced for Ziggy Marley, Happy Mondays, and other notables.

Producing, however rewarding and enriching, apparently doesn't provide the thrill of performance though, and last year on a whim, the three decided to do something about it.

Their solution was to join Blast, a guitarist Frantz and Weymouth knew well, and begin recording songs in a studio in Connecticut. The sound was distinctively theirs, and luckily the muse that hovered belatedly on their shoulders was a prolific one. They cut a dozen tracks in two weeks, remarking with elation that, as Weymouth happily put it, "This is our sound. No one else is doing it."

The three sent a cassette of the lyric-less songs to a dozen admired singers for consideration, including such talented and varying artists as Debbie Harry, Andy Partridge, Gavin Friday, Johnette Napolitano of Concrete Blonde, Gordon Gano of Violent Femmes, and Ed "the-last-name-just-rolls-off-the-tongue" Kowalczyk of Live. They recorded an album of fun, funky songs with a mix of styles, staying true to the experimental legacy of the Talking Heads, and are now touring with music from their newly released album, living up to Harrison's aphorism, "No matter how great producing is, you still miss playing."

The Heads perform tomorrow night at Pearl Street in Northampton at 8 p.m. Call the club at 584-0777 for more information.

Premier of new translation

By Seema Gangatirkar
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Theater Department will present the world premier of a new translation of God of Vengeance.

This classic Yiddish morality play by Sholem Asch has been translated by Amy Levinson, an M.F.A. candidate in the theater department. The play debuts tonight in the Rand Theater at 8 p.m.

God of Vengeance is about a 20th century Polish brothel keeper, trying to keep his teenage daughter innocent and pure, despite her surroundings. Originally written in 1907, an English version of the play premiered in New York City in 1922. The play's shocking subject material closed the show down on opening night. Asch went on to become well– known for his fiction and authored over 20 novels.

This production of God of Vengeance is a move to bring back Yiddish theater.

Central and eastern European Jews used Yiddish as their everyday language for centuries. The intellectuals of the times looked down at Yiddish as a vulgar and corrupted language.

In the 19th century, Yiddish was embraced as a vital part of Jewish culture. The language was used in everything from novels to newspapers. Yiddish theaters found homes in Vilna, Odessa, Bucharest, Warsaw, London and New York.

After World War I, tougher immigration laws were created and

Taking a hike up the Mount Holyoke Trail

Curious about the massive white mansion that looks over Interstate 91 from its elevated perch in the Holyoke Range? Before the weather turns from cold and grey to frigid and white, stop looking up at the old summit hotel and start climbing the Mount Holyoke Summit Trail.

Alfresco News with Liz Anderson

Now that the days are shorter and snow showers are becoming a part of the daily forecast, it is a great time to sneak in one last autumn hike, before Old Man Winter closes the Mount Holyoke Summit Hotel.

The Mount Holyoke Summit Trail begins up a steep path, and is well-graded due to the fact it was built in the pre– automobile days, when horses were forced to take people up to the resort hotel at the summit.

The climb is a short half–mile, and in matter of 30 minutes, you can reach the historic hotel. From the hotel's elegant veranda there is an impressive view of the Connecticut River, and the Mount Tom Range extending southwest on the opposite side of the river.

If you want to continue your hike from the colonial hotel, then pick up the Metacomet–Monadnock Trail, and the Halfway House Trail, which coincide at the summit.

The Metacomet–Monadnock Trail is a 98–mile footpath that connects the Holyoke Range with the Mount Tom Range. It begins on the Connecticut border and ends on the summit of Mount Monadnock in southern New Hampshire.

The Halfway House Trail travels over a moderate climb through the ridges of Holyoke Range over wooden footbridges and through dense woods on a well–worn path.

To reach the trail head of the Mount Holyoke Summit Trail from the University of Massachusetts, take Route 116 to Route 47, and continue straight until you reach Mountain Road. Follow Mountain Road to Skinner State Park, and continue up the paved road to the old Halfway House, where parking is available.

Before you set out on your adventure in the rugged foothills of the Holyoke Range beware of November's unpredictable temperatures. Sudden and extreme variations in temperature and wind speed are common this time of year. Rain will often turn into snow due to a drop in temperature of as much as 40 degrees Farenheit. It is important that you are aware of the weather conditions before you begin your trip.

The Mount Holyoke Summit Trail was named after Elizer Holyoke, one of three men appointed by the General Court of Massachusetts Bay Colony in 1653 to divide lands in this region into plantations for the first settlers.

Climb to the summit and learn about the historic white house on the hill before Old Man Winter locks its doors shut for the season.

For more information about the Holyoke Range call Outing Club at 545–1313.

Guy Davis calls down Thunder and old blues souls.

Hughes takes the elevator

From the "train they call the city of New Orleans," trumpeter/singer Leroy Jones has come, and he just put out his second album on Columbia entitled, Props For Pops.

Influence is one thing, but Jones has put together his own little tribute for his idol and mentor, Louis "Pops" /"Satchmo" Armstrong. He hired a little help from his friends, one of them being Harry Connick, Jr., with whom Jones played with on Connick albums like Blue Light, Red Light and She.

Starting off with "Props For Pops," a Jones original, we see Jones lending a dixieland touch to a basic bebop structure. This formula rules the instrumentals on the album. The Johnny Mercer classic "Jeepers Creepers" features dueling horns on its well–known theme. However, lots of Props is vocal jazz, with Jones' own sinewy, slippery vocals dripping out of the stereo, especially on "Someday You'll Be Sorry" (with a great piano solo by Connick) and Armstrong's greatest hit, "What A Wonderful World." This is no classic album, but for those who like dixieland and vocal jazz, it would be recommended.

• The polar opposites of dixieland (one of the oldest jazz styles in America) are synth–jazz and easy–listening jazz. Let me introduce Brian Hughes and write a little on him and let him go, because that is quite easy to do. His Straight To You album (Higher Octave) starts off so good, making the elevator music that pollutes the last three or four songs that much more infuriating. "Pica" is saucy Latin jazz with a rocking theme and "Andalusian Nights" has a percussion solo that gets the heart moving faster. But, after those second and third songs, it isn't long before the elevator starts kicking in.

"Casa Magica," track six, seems to have had potential, but with that dreamy sound on guitar, dislocated from the band, it gets real new agey real fast. All that synth and new agey production doesn't help much either. By "Pamela" and "Sesimbra," tracks seven and eight, one is reaching for the razor blades and "Bridges and Rain," as well as "And To Beauty," the closing two tracks, where the insult is too deep to go back. Sad.

• The fact that there is such elevator–jazz out there would make one really proud to own Billy Drummond's Dubai (Criss Cross). The Virginia–born drummer, who is much sought after on the New York City jazz scene (he's appeared with Sonny Rollins, and Freddie Hubbard as well as with new faces like bassist Christian McBride), shows that he is just comfortable with open–ended hard bop.

Dubai's lineup of drums, bass (by Peter Washington), and two tenor saxophonists (Walt Weiskopf and Chris Potter) allow for more freedom, with no chording pianist present. This is not the harmonic free–for–all characteristic of Ornette Coleman, but instead a free, coasting jazz ride with fascinating rhythms by Drummond. "Drumhead" (by Weiskopf) features exciting concepts by Drummond that push on the sax players and is the best song here. The album also gives a lot of solos to Washington, on bass, a rare occurrence on any jazz album that the bassist is not the leader.

• The big story this week in re–releases is Dave Brubeck's Time Further Out. Released in 1961, this is the follow–up to the most famous jazz album ever by the pianist's Quartet, 1959's Time Out. The waltz–time (3/4) pieces "It's A Raggy Waltz" and "Bluette" are spectacular, especially the latter with its Frederic Chopin–like opening and Brubeck's against–the–tempo solo.

The Quartet moves up through time signatures. Two songs in 5/4, follow–

IRC: talking the day away

Internet offers up addictive connection

Despite popular misconception, the Internet is more than just the World Wide Web and e–mail. Internet Relay Chat (IRC) is quite popular, and perhaps a bigger draw to the Net than the Web because it is highly addictive.

The days when IRC was the exclusive domain of computer geeks, and academic researchers making banal small talk are long over; now IRC allows more people to mindlessly chat about nothing in particular.

Users have various options when using IRC. The first is logging in through the University's various servers like Frost and Wilde. At the VMS prompt type "use irc" followed simply by "irc."

Although logging in through the servers is the easiest way to connect, it is the least user friendly method once connected because commands are cryptic. Heightening the frustration of this method is OIT's lack of support.

The best way to connect is through the University's UMaccess account because Windows and Mac IRC applications simplify those obscure commands. Even veterans who know IRC commands inside and out will enjoy these applications because they breathe new life into what was once a rather drab aspect of the Internet.

Beyond making IRC user friendly, these applications add sound and graphics to the world of chat. Now whenever the banter becomes boring, users can inject the chat room with a an entertaining sound file. Plus IRC users can also easily talk on multi–channels by opening separate windows on their screens.

A slew of low cost shareware IRC applications are available for Windows 3.1 and 95. The two most common ones are Visual IRC 96, and mIRC. Both sport similar features like built–in support for wave and MIDI sound files, toolbars, hyperlinks to a users Web browser, multi–channel chat windows and color coded text to differentiate between emotes and discussion. Despite the similar features, the two applications have markedly different interfaces.

Lacking the glitzy flare of ViRC, mIRC sports a crude, basic looking interface, but looks are deceiving. Despite its appearance, mIRC has a fast learning curve, and in about an hour or two a new user will become a veteran. After installing the application, and tooling around for a few hours, I found myself giving advice out to other new mIRC users.

Unfortunately ViRC is not as friendly as mIRC. Although it has a more refined interface like most commercial applications, it was a facade. After tinkering with it for two hours, I still only knew about the same as I did after the first 30 minutes of use.

ViRC does offer a few features that mIRC lacks like LagScope, a feature that lets users know how server delays are affecting them, and its own programming language. However, casual IRC users may never use such features even if they can figure out how.

Both applications and others for both Windows and Mac are available on various shareware sites on the web like shareware.com. Because I find ViRC hard to learn, I recommend mIRC because of its ease of use. However, if you are a power user looking for a challenge, then by all means tackle ViRC.

SPIN DOCTOR

She came bounding into one of our on–campus information sessions about a year ago, an engineering undergrad carrying a bag of dismantled hard drives.

"Look," she said, and pointed out a subtle inefficiency in the servo mechanism, which to that day, only our top engineers had recognized.

TAKE US THERE

Then she gave us a half hour lecture on how to fix it, and we told her about state–of–the–art labs; she launched into a monologue about data storage and what we should be doing about it, so we told her what we are doing about it.

She said there's a lot of work to be done, and we invited her to join us, and do it. And since then, she's taken storage technology to the Nth degree. Helped revolutionize how portable hard drives work.

Which brings us back to campus. This semester we're scouting the country again, looking for more spirited people and ideas. We're pushing this company to the Nth degree.

And you can take us there.

Spring Heeled Jack hits the road

SPRING HEELED JACK
Nov. 9
Pearl Street

To a sold out audience on Saturday night, Spring Heeled Jack played a plethora of great ska tunes off their new release titled Static World View.

From the beginning, SPJ ostentatiously moved the crowd, never allowing one dull moment to pervade the audience. One of their more popular tunes, "Addicted," which is featured on the CD Oi! Skampilation, helped jump-start the show.

The band intricately weaved new styles of ska-funk with the old school basics of melodic trombone harmonies and drum rolls.

"Pigeon-Holed" had the pre-pubescent crowd jumping and screaming and conglomerating into a mosh pit frenzy. All the teens on stage weren't holding back either. Alongside the band, the thrill seekers dodged the horn line just to get into the skankin' spotlight for their two seconds of fame.

Interestingly, SPJ did a minute tribute to a few influential bands. They commemorated many heavy metal greats, including AC/DC and Iron Maiden, by introducing their hit "Pay Your Dues" with a humorous and admirable electric guitar intro and a nonchalant stage dive.

During "Freedom," trumpetist Tyler Jones, a.k.a. "the Black Spark," (who didn't neglect to make the audience laugh all night with his bagel catching tricks) appeared at the back of the room and played harmony while scurrying his way onto the stage.

The trombonist, Chris Rhodes, appeared only minutes later standing on an adjacent bartop while soulfully spewing out the instrumental Star Wars theme song. "Running Man," another of their better-known hits, completed the musical cavalcade of this up and rising ska band.

Three opening bands preceded the headliners. Out of Boston, Big D and the Kids Table impressively displayed their panorama of ska with heavy punk and, at times, rap influences.

The Agents, from Providence, R.I., were slightly more mature, as was their sound. It was harder to take in the sounds of a band that hardly deviated from their simplistic lyrics and basic horn melodies. They seemed to lose momentum from the moment they took the stage. Even so, there were moments where the Agents shined through. The final song, "Skank It Up" had vibrant horn sounds while the audience screamed along.

Big Lick, needless to say, was the most impressive of the opening bands. Out of Norfolk, Big Lick admirably fused sounds of all musical genres throughout their set. Although much of the set's songs hailed from their debut self-titled album, Big Lick didn't hesitate to try some new material.

The highlight of the night, a mindblowing cover of "Jump Around" by House of Pain which was interrupted with another cover "Just A Girl" by No Doubt. It was humorous to say the least. Big Lick not only made a memorable appearance, but they graciously warmed up an audience that was prepared for hours of respectable ska music.

The stars in "Jeopardy"

By Jeremy Brothers
Collegian Staff

No, it's not a '90s remake of The Poseidon Adventure, it's just one of the most enjoyable seasons for game shows — Celebrity "Jeopardy."

This kind of special programming allows the rich and famous to strut their smarts on syndication for their favorite charity, while allowing us to find out who's not the brightest banana in the bunch. The line up so far looks to include Beverly Sills, John Mahoney, Laura Innes, Melissa Gilbert, Isaac Mizrahi, Sandra Bernhard, Carl Lewis, John Lovitz, Matthew Fox, Brett Butler, Earta Kitt, Robert Loggia, Renee Taylor and Alicia Witt.

Fans of last year's tournament will fondly remember the tense battle between Charles Shaughnessy from "The Nanny" and David Duchovny from "The X-Files" while "Baywatch" betty Yasmeene Bleeth looked on helplessly.

Speaking of The Poseidon Adventure, that neglected disaster picture genre is slowly making a comeback after all. This summer's Twister seemed to revel in its forefather's wake; in fact the only thing that was missing was George Elliot. Not a moment too soon, NBC unveiled "Pandora's Clock," the TV miniseries about a deadly virus which is released aboard an airplane midflight.

Coming to your nearest theater quickly is Sylvester Stallone's Daylight, in which a commuter tunnel collapses. Guess who leads the survivors out ... That's right — Sly himself, making another action picture before Copland, his "serious" acting comeback featuring Al Pacino, Jeanine Garafalo and Robert DeNiro. Next summer is slated to bring Pierce Brosnan and a really big volcano together in Danie's Peak. And you thought it should have ended when Shelly Winters sang "There has to be a morning after..." Shame!

ing in the footsteps of Time Out's hit "Take Five," feature sweet Paul Desmond alto sax solos on "Far More Blue" and a great tom-based drum solo on "Far More Drums." They continue on with songs in 6/4, 7/4, 8/8 and 9/8 and two new extra tracks, one of them a live version of "It's A Raggy Waltz."

• Guy Davis is quite a gutsy blues singer and guitarist. On his new Call Down The Thunder album (Red House), he calls down the souls of the old bluesmen, like Mance Lipscomb ("Run Sinner Run," with good slide work) and Robert Johnson ("When You Got A Good Friend," with upbeat drumming). Most of his own compositions echo the old blues, but "The Road Is Calling" steps out of that vein to present a soulful, organ-seasoned taste of how great modern blues could be. That song alone makes the disc good.

Sainte–Marie returns home

Singer–songwriter, and alumna of the University of Massachusetts, Buffy Sainte-Marie will speak tomorrow at Memorial Hall at 4 p.m., in a lecture entitled "Up Where We Belong: Growing Beyond the Rat Race."

Popular in the 1960s, Sainte–Marie was signed to Vanguard Records recording what many have called "protest songs."

She expressed dissatisfaction with this term,"the only reason I ever became a singer in the first place was because I had something to say."

After the birth of her son in the late '70s, Sainte–Marie went off into obscurity only to reappear sporadically. She was a cast member of "Sesame Street" for five years and in 1982 received the Academy Award for her song "Up Where We Belong," the theme to the movie, An Officer and a Gentleman.

After her 15–year hiatus from the recording studios, Sainte–Marie released Coincidence and Other Stories whose single "The Big Ones Get Away" reached the top 40 on the British charts. In 1993, she was named Best International Artist of 1993 by France and was selected by the United Nations to proclaim the International Year of Indigenous People.

Sainte–Marie will also perform at 7:30 p.m., Thursday, Nov. 14 in the John M. Greene Hall at Smith College. Both the lecture and concert are free and open to the public.

Selig, Levine clash in baseball labor talks

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Acting commissioner Bud Selig took no steps yesterday to save baseball's labor deal, leaving interleague play and revenue sharing one day from collapse.

"If the deal is not made, you're in permanent limbo," said union head Donald Fehr.

After Monday's meeting, Selig told Fehr he would ponder his options and get back to him. The only contact since then has been a telephone conversation late Tuesday night that lasted about one minute.

"Nothing the players do matters," Fehr said. "One of the certainties of this negotiation is what the players say or do makes no difference. The owners are going to do what they're going to do."

Owners rejected the proposed agreement last week, and Selig asked the union to make additional concessions. Fehr rejected the move Monday, leaving Selig with the decision to take the deal or leave it.

Management negotiator Randy Levine has told Selig he would resign as of midnight EST tonight if there's no deal. Because Selig failed to support the agreement Levine and Fehr completed Oct. 24 , it's highly unlikely players would give serious attention to Levine's successor.

"Following this experience, it's going to be very difficult how to figure out how to deal with any negotiator in the future," Fehr said.

If there isn't a deal by today's deadline, free agents would start signing Friday under the rules of the labor agreement that expired in December 1993. That deal remains in force under a federal court order. Because of that, it appears the only way owners can get new work rules in the future is either a spring-training lockout designed to force a union collapse or a move to lift the injunction — an act the players would treat as a declaration of war.

"Hopefully they don't push the issue and there won't be a confrontation," Fehr said.

Packers look for win in Texas Stadium

By Arnie Stapleton

GREEN BAY, Wis. — No boasts, no taunts. The Green Bay Packers are saying all the right things leading to Monday night's showdown with the Dallas Cowboys.

The Packers, six-time losers at Texas Stadium over the last three seasons, insist they never were among the critics dismissing Dallas for its slow start.

"How can you write off the defending champions?" halfback Edgar Bennett asked. "Until somebody beats them when it counts, you can't write a team like that off. They still have a lot of firepower."

Wide receiver Anthony Morgan was in agreement.

"I know they're not going to be a team to just fold and back down," he said. "Now they're all back together. Now they're jelling."

With Michael Irvin back from his drug suspension and cornerback Kevin Smith and receiver Kevin Williams on the mend, the Cowboys (6-4) are right back in the NFC East race, one game behind Washington and Philadelphia, thanks to last week's victory at San Francisco.

"We were pretty good, too, about five or six weeks ago," said Packers quarterback Brett Favre. "We still are. But we've taken some big blows."

Green Bay (8-2) was the NFL's dominant team until receivers Robert Brooks and Antonio Freeman were injured. Then came the loss of Pro Bowl tight end Mark Chmura (heel), whom Favre calls the best run-blocker in the league.

It's hard to swagger when you're limping.

The Packers seemed to be everybody's favorite to win the Super Bowl until Green Bay and Dallas reversed fortunes.

Defensive tackle Santana Dotson, the Packers' best hope to finally clog Emmitt Smith's running lanes, said he knew it was just a matter of time before the Cowboys returned to their winning ways.

"The season was young," Dotson said. "Now, they're a game out of first. You know how that goes, a month and a-half of football and you try to write teams off? That's not going to happen. They're not going to go away easily. They're going to go away kicking and screaming."

Dallas' dogmatism actually helped the Packers last week, Dotson said.

After Green Bay had fallen at Kansas City, the Cowboys did the Packers a huge favor in the race for homefield advantage by knocking off the Niners (7-3).

"The Cowboys' overtime win is going to give them a momentum swing," Dotson said. "But they helped us as far a the NFC standings. And that's all that matters. Destiny is in our hands. We have the best record in the NFC and it's up to us to keep it. I'd hate to say I was rooting for the Cowboys. But I appreciated the win, I guess."

There, Dallas, even a thank you.

Yet, when all the pundits picked Green Bay to win the Super Bowl this year, the Packers realized they were encroaching on the Cowboys' turf.

"Green Bay's been getting all the press," said safety LeRoy Butler. "They didn't get any preseason hype. We got it all. So they have to respect that.

"But deep down, you know they think, 'Just the intimidating factor that we beat them six times will put just a little fear into their hearts that we can beat them.' And they're wrong. We're not intimidated by anybody. By anything."

Maligned Speight ends career as an Eagle

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

BOSTON — Boston College cornerback Kiernan Speight, accused but exonerated in the gambling scandal that led to the suspension of 13 teammates, said yesterday he will not return to the team.

"Right now, I think the door's been shut as far as I'm concerned," he said during a news conference at the office of attorney John McBride. "I'm going to go ahead and move on with my life and try to finish the semester out and put the whole thing behind me and try to start anew somewhere."

The BC sophomore was among four players confronted by the team's captains and coach Dan Henning during a contentious meeting following the Eagles' Halloween night loss to Pittsburgh.

The other three players were among those suspended by the school, but Speight was not. He feels he is entitled to an apology from the school and an explanation about how his name wound up on a list of players suspected of gambling.

Henning said he has tried to get in touch with Speight but hasn't been able to reach him. While not apologizing, the coach has stressed that no member of the coaching staff ever accused Speight of anything.

"If BC didn't put it on a list, who put it on there?" Speight asked.

Speight skipped last week's game against Notre Dame, saying he couldn't concentrate on football after seeing his name besmirched. After going home to Washington to think about it some more, he decided not to finish the year.

"It's just a shame that innocent people have become involved," captain Omari Walker said before yesterday's practice. "I feel bad for him."

Walker said he had lunch Tuesday with Speight and tried to talk him into returning.

"I apologized for my role in the whole thing," Walker said. "What we were just trying to do was get to the root of the problem."

Speight said that wasn't good enough.

"I think it's more than Omari Walker," he said. "He's a player on a team just like I am. Obviously he has to answer to someone and he just doesn't make decisions affecting the whole team, somebody is above him who makes these decisions. I don't see it being Omari Walker's fault."

Gambling on any sporting events is a violation of NCAA rules. The school has announced that all 13 players who were suspended will miss the final two games of the season, against Temple on Saturday and the following Saturday at Miami.

200 wins since its inception in 1978. Impressive.

It is already known about Kater's Hermann Trophy in 1990, which by the way, is a season you don't want to mention to her (I've heard). You see, the NCAA Tournament was still a 12-team playoff at that time, instead of its current 32-team setup, and No. 13 UMass did not make it for some unfathomable reason. The Minutewomen made the tournament again this year, and they have kept up the streak since that fateful season.

Bitterness reigned, and Kater had said to The Boston Globe at that time, "[The Hermann Trophy] doesn't make up for missing the NCAA's, though. I'd trade it in for being able to play in the postseason and I hope the award helps UMass to continue to recruit top players." Class.

And that hope was true, as players like Briana Scurry, Paula Wilkins, Rachel LeDuc, Erin Lynch and Rebecca Myers came to wear the Maroon and White.

Until last season, the three-time NSCAA first-team All- America selection and two-time Adidas Academic All- America selection was atop almost all of the career scoring records. Before Rachel LeDuc last year, and then Rebecca Myers this year, Kater had the career goals (35) and points scored (92) marks to her name.

After doing some assistant coaching duties with Rudy here at UMass in 1993 and 94, she now is coach of the recently created women's soccer program at Syracuse. Her team went to a winning record this year, and it looks like she will develop a tradition for the Orange as well.

After watching Myers surpass those records, and after hours of researching our handy women's soccer media guide, a chance to meet one of UMass' all-time greats was before me. I choked. I said, "Hey!" to Powell and Lynch (they said, "hi!"), and kept walking. What a dolt I am.

Continuing to Rudy's office, I met the coach who was feverishly preparing for this weekend's 1 p.m. first round NCAA matchup at Harvard. I grabbed him by the cuff, and said, "Was that a legend I just saw?" He acknowledged my question, and then left me in his dust as he ran off to take care of team business. I think he was saying something Al Davis-like, "The team will run, and they will run hard."

Following Rudy through the bowels of Boyden, he turns to me and says something like, "Will you just go and introduce yourself, she'll be tickled, believe me."

So, I turned back to the main entrance hall, walked right up to her, and muttered, "Welllll, the coach told me to introduce myself to you..."

We talked for a minute or so, she slyly questioned me if i was doing my job or not, I replied to the best of my ability, and that was it. It might mean nothing to some people, but it was the world to a soccer fan. Maybe, not the world, but it definitely brightened my day.

written all over him, and that means NBA. Otherwise, UNC will do alright, fighting Duke for the second spot in the ACC.

No. 9 Michigan — Robert Traylor in the front and JUCO transfer Brandum Hughes in the back: these two will be key components to the Wolverines' success. Maurice Taylor and Louis Bullock will also carry part of the scoring burden, as the juniors try to claim the success fans' expected when the class was dubbed 'the Next Fab Five.'

No NCAA violations means the green light for this year's team. Memo to Steve Fisher: Just a thought, coach, but this year, take the keys away from Maurice.

No. 10 Duke — Rickey Price, Taymon Domzalski, Jeff Capel, Steve Wojciechowski, Greg Newton... and those are the returning players. Roshown McLeod, a transfer from St. John's (the first in Mike Krzyzewski's tenure), Trajan Langdon (back after a medical redshirt), Nate James (a blue-chipper highly sought after by Maryland) and recruits Chris Carrawell and Mike Chappell only add to the depth.

No. 11 Iowa State — Guard Dedric Willoughby will carry the Cyclones' hopes on his shoulders.

No. 12 Syracuse — The loss of Winfred Walton (for the season) will hurt the Orangemen. Listen closely and you can hear Jim Boeheim crybabying now.

No. 13 Arkansas — Kareem Reid, Derek Hood and recruit Glendon Alexander give the Razorbacks a chance, although I don't think they're quite top 15 material.

No. 14 Fresno State — Jerry Tarkanian has put together a program with sound hoop talent, albeit morally shaky players. But then, look who their coach is.

No. 15 Massachusetts — UMass dropped after the marquis names left, but the guard tandem of Edgar Padilla and Carmelo Travieso will keep UMass in the hunt. And of course there's newcomer Lari Ketner, who will make his presence felt.

• Conspicuously missing from the Top 25 was Arizona. Although the Wildcats are a young team, they have a workhorse in Myles Simon and a very talented recruit in Mike Bibby.

I guess the voters had to make room for the likes of Connecticut. Oh, wait, they didn't make it either. Oops.

robbery incident. My sense of idealism was lost when I heard the news. Oh, Eagles, why hast thou forsaken me!

Speaking of Eagles, Boston College was supposed to suck, so you really can't be disappointed.

The "Friends of the Program" Inside Tip pick of the week...

I changed the name because I felt like it, and because BC jokes got old quick. I hope the new name will do justice to all those people behind the scenes, the boosters who buy the blue-chippers the cars and the gym-bags full of cash. The ones who clean up those messy paternity suits and bar-room brawls, the high rollers who do all the dirty work but get none of the credit. I'll recognize you, oh shady ones!

You realize, of course, that I'm being sarcastic.

This week, my "friends" pick is Michigan, a 1.5 point underdog at home against Penn St. I see the Wolverines squashing an overrated PSU squad like a grape.

Booty Schwag of the Week Award...

I'm giving it to Wyoming. You know why? Not because they lost to San Diego St., but because they wear brown and yellow uniforms. They honestly look like the bottom of a toilet.

As for tonight's game, Georgia Tech vs. Maryland. If you watch this game instead of "Friends," you might as well transfer to UConn, 'cause you're no good for us here in Amherst.

HOROSCOPES

ARIES
March 21–April 20

If someone seems a little shy, turn on the charm. Your sparkling personality could be the key to starting a great new friendship. Pay attention to other social obligations—you could be committing a major faux pas without thinking.

TAURUS
April 21–May 21

If you're tempted to spend, take a close look at upcoming expenses. You might be in a position to loosen the purse strings a little—but if you're not, the consequences could be disastrous. To save even more money, find creative ways to recycle.

GEMINI
May 22–June 21

Feeling bored? Try planning a big social event. If that seems overwhelming, enlist a friend to help you with some of the details. Need ideas for what to do? Consider a picnic with a volleyball game or a group camping trip.

CANCER
June 22–July 22

Don't skimp on preventive maintenance this week. You could avert an expensive breakdown. Bone up on your technical skills before making a major career decision, and you'll reap the benefits in the near future.

LEO
July 23–August 23

Take a close look at a bad habit you'd like to break. Now could be the right time to make that change. Once you've started, don't be discouraged if it's tougher than you first thought. This is a good time to make a change for the better.

VIRGO
August 24–September 22

An unexpected brush with the past could send you off in a different direction. Consult with your family before doing anything drastic. It's a splendid time for traveling. You could make an interesting discovery in a new land.

LIBRA
September 23–October 23

Your consistent efforts at a tedious project are about to be noticed, so don't let up, even if you're near the end of your rope. Keep track of your cash flow so you don't get caught off-guard by an expensive mishap. Call on a friend to get some extra advice.

SCORPIO
October 24–November 22

The competition could be tougher than it looks when it comes to a difficult project. Ask for help from a close friend. Use your wits, don't be afraid to innovate and you'll be fine. Don't waste your breath arguing with a stubborn person.

SAGITTARIUS
November 23–December 21

If you're looking for romance, try making the first move. Consider volunteering for something. You could acquire valuable new skills and enjoy life more, too. Chaos at home sets your teeth on edge. You can straighten things out by delegating tasks.

CAPRICORN
December 22–January 20

Your sense of perspective lets you understand the big picture. Use this knowledge to your advantage, but don't be surprised if others don't share your insight. Instead, focus on individual problems and try to solve them efficiently.

AQUARIUS
January 21–February 18

Bring something that's bothering you out into the open. If you let it fester, it will only get worse. But do it tactfully—thoughtless words are an enemy to progress. A little extra good fortune smiles on you as the week comes to a close.

PISCES
February 19–March 20

Take a close look at your "Things to Do" list. Although it seems overwhelming, if you start to assign priorities, it will start to grow more manageable. Make an investment in your future. Household chores lead to a change that's refreshing to you.

Things not to do at a job interview

10) Answer all questions with, "I'm sorry, were you talking to me?"
9) Make frequent references to your vast library of pornography.
8) When your interviewer reaches to shake your hand, shriek like a little girl and run away.
7) Begin each of your responses by muttering under your breath, "Nosy little bastard..."
6) Don't wear pants.
5) Bring a snarling weasel with you into the room.
4) Fake a heart attack.
3) Conclude interview by blowing your interviewer a kiss.
2) Bring travel Yahtzee and start a game with your imaginary friend "Peepers."
1) Fire up.

Women's soccer has to regroup

"You thought you was the cool fool and never could do no wrong/ Had everything sewed up tight, how come you lay awake all night long?" — Grateful Dead, Sugaree

Winning starts with the right attitude, and before taking the field for Sunday's Atlantic 10 Championship match, despite not having the services of its top two players in Erin Lynch and Rebecca Myers, the attitude of the Massachusetts women's soccer team was nothing but over-confident.

This attitude must change if UMass plans on advancing beyond Sunday's NCAA first round match at No. 7 Harvard, where according to the team's itinerary for the weekend, they will give "90 minutes of heart."

UMass had never lost in the A-10 Tournament. The cocky Minutewomen knew they had the match won before they even boarded their vans on posh Goat Island, sentiments amplified when Sandy Shimogaki scored against Dayton's back-up keeper six minutes into the match.

No Lynch, no Myers, no matter; it's only Dayton.

The vaunted Minutewomen expect victory in every A-10 contest, affairs they generally worry less about than their next breaths. Victory is automatic. UMass knows it. St. Joe's knows it. Fordham knows it. Everyone knows it.

Leigh Torbin

Dayton was clueless. Unfearful, it toppled UMass, tearing its aura of invincibility asunder.

I saw this twice last weekend, as Saturday night "Iron" Mike Tyson was knocked flat on his butt. The invincible specter of Tyson laid to rest by unfrightened 25-1 underdog Evander Holyfield. Like UMass in the A-10, Tyson has entered the ring for each of his fights, over-confidently not thinking victory, but knowing that he will win.

Luke Skywalker pointed out that the Emperor's over-confidence was his biggest weakness in Return of the Jedi, and the good guys pulled out a big victory there.

Sans delusions of grandeur, UMass faced some cold, hard facts as it fell behind to a lesser Dayton team running on adrenaline alone. The Flyers whooped and hollered on their bench throughout the match, while the disconsolate Minutewomen sat silently as their team tried to rally.

More than anything in terms of tactics and personnel, it is this defeated, apathetic attitude that needs to be altered before Sunday's clash with Harvard. Somewhere between now and the Allston tolls, major regrouping and soul-searching must be completed.

That, and if Lynch's hamstring injury keeps her out further, someone will have to step forward and lead this team on the field. Someone like Erica Iverson or Robin Smith will have to assume this role next year and, in a sneak peek of 1997 on Sunday, no one stepped forward.

A crushed Tyson has four months until his next bout, while UMass has four days to prepare for its next battle.

Credit coach Jim Rudy for doing everything he can to help his team find its long-lost intensity, missing in the wake of Sunday's crushing loss. Yesterday's practice was straight out of a boot camp.

Not only did the Minutewomen run like, well, cross country coach Julie LaFreniere's Minutewomen, but to further intensify practice, Rudy played the role of a librarian, instructing his team that "silence is golden."

After all, if the players can't concentrate on keeping their mouths shut for a couple of hours, they probably can't concentrate on defeating Harvard on its home field.

Everything cushy is gone. Rather than stay in a nice Boston hotel Saturday night, UMass will leave for Harvard at 8:30 a.m. on the day of the match.

The old adage goes that the true measure of a champion's greatness is not how hard it falls, but rather how quickly it can get back up.

The degrading loss to Dayton effectively served as a swift kick in the rear for the Minutewomen. The issue at hand now, with the A-10 trophy stowed away in Ohio, is whether or not it will have an adverse effect in the NCAAs.

Kater returns to UM

Jorma Kansanen

There are some times in life when the littlest thing will occur, and it will brighten up your day. It could be that a class that you've not done the studying for has been cancelled; it could be a paper that you've not written has been pushed back a week; or, if you're a certain verbose sports writer, an article you have to write doesn't need to be written.

Well, a certain little thing happened to me yesterday...

I met April Kater, a Massachusetts sports legend.

Who, you inquire with a tone of sarcastic ambivalence? You're telling me you don't know who she is? Well, I guess you don't, because if you were here at UMass back in 1990, when she received the Hermann Trophy for being the top women's soccer player in the country, you either feel like me, Martin Jones or Hussein Ibish.

To say it flat out, I had a real bad day yesterday. I just missed a class that I hadn't studied for; did not write a paper that had already been pushed back a week; and for this certain verbose sports writer, the previous two occurrences were because a story needed to be written. Basically, I needed a lift, and for my own sporting reasons, meeting her for just a minute or two did.

Let's go step by step with this encounter with greatness, shall we?

I was walking down the second floor of Boyden Gym, to No. 19 Massachusetts women's soccer assistant coach Chris Chamides' office to drop off some old Collegians. Hey, I can't help it if they are big fans.

Rolling up on his office, I saw junior keeper Danielle Dion, who was looking for Chamides, too, and said, "Hey!" She ignored me, but that is expected. You have to think that after a season full of questions like, "Hey, how did you feel after that big save?"; or "Hey, what was your motivation to start goalkeeping?"; and even something real asinine like, "Hey, how are you doing?" even someone as acquiescent like myself would like to tell that person to sod off. No, she's a great girl. I kid.

So, I then head off to go see if coach Jim Rudy is in, and a gathering evolves in front of my eyes in the main entrance hall to Boyden. Dion, seniors Amy Powell and Erin Lynch, field hockey assistant coach Amy Robertson and star midfielder Kyle Rothenberger surrounded someone, and I was able to get a glimpse of Kater amidst the hubbub.

Over the years, I have read so much about Kater, that almost a legendary quality has evolved in my mindset concerning her. (Well, stupid, haven't you already said she's a legend?) But anyway, the tradition of UMass women's soccer is a known fact, and she is definitely one of the torchbearers. Six final fours, now going on 14 NCAA Tournament appearances, and over

Tennessee tops the top chokers of college football

Arizona State 35, Cal 7.

Sometimes even a football guru as great as myself is wrong, and I'm man enough to admit when I've made a mistake. Hell, I even gave myself the Booty Schwag once. I guess I'm not as brilliant as I thought I was.

Okay, maybe I lost my head for a minute. Of course I'm still brilliant.

That being said, let's talk football.

With the season winding down, I though we could talk a little about some teams that disappointed this season. Teams that bit the big one, choked, didn't show up, whatever. Here are my Top 10 chokers of 1996

Luke Meredith on College Football

1. Tennessee — The Vols came into 1996 ranked No. 2, coming off a huge win over Ohio St. in last year's Citrus Bowl. Peyton Manning was supposed to lead UT to the Fiesta Bowl, and then part the Red Sea, turn water into wine, and forgive us for all our sins before taking his place in the NFL hierarchy. Or so the hype would make us believe.

And what happened? They choked! The Vols are now 6–2, and will have to watch Florida take their place in the SEC championship. And by the way, Coach Fullmer, any more losses to teams like Memphis, and you'll be selling Elvis coffee mugs at Graceland by season's end.

2. Kansas — When Glen Mason passed up the Georgia job to stay in Lawrence, I don't think he envisioned his squad going down the tubes so fast. The Jayhawks, who humiliated UCLA on national television in the Hula Bowl last Christmas, probably won't go to a bowl this season. Hey, June Henley. It's now November, and you're 4–5.

3. Texas A&M — The Aggies are usually one of the best teams in the country. Oops. They're 5–5, 3–3 in the Big 12, which is the equivalent to dying in a plane crash for A&M faithful. I know you lost Leeland McElroy, but come on, Coach R.C. Slocum. The Aggies only consolation...

4. Texas — Their bitter rival Texas had just about as bad a season as they did. After a few lean years, Texas was supposed to be back. Despite James Brown, the Horns have limped to a 5–4 record. But take heart, UT fans. The Longhorns will probably sneak into a decent bowl as the four seed from the Big 12.

5. Syracuse — Losses to North Carolina and Minnesota to start the year dug a hole Paul Pasqualoni's crew just couldn't dig out of, even though they're on a tear right now. They'll still win the Big East, but they should be in the national championship hunt with talent like Donovan McNabb.

6. Nebraska — What, Luke? They're 8–1, and fifth in the country. Yeah, I know, but that loss to Arizona St. knocked them out of what was supposed to be a third straight national championship. The Huskers probably have the most talent in America, but that won't help them now.

7. Notre Dame — Stupid losses to Air Force and Ohio State prevented Ron Powlus from proving his critics wrong.

8. Duke — They're 0–9? I know they weren't supposed to be good, but 0–9 is bad for anyone.

9. Tulane — People were saying they were the class of Conference USA at the start of the year. Not that that's any big deal, but the Green Wave have bombed, going 2–7.

10. North Texas — Not the 4–6 record, but the hotel

Lacrosse club heads into Boyden; intramural playoffs under weather

As winter begins, the Massachusetts lacrosse club has gone indoors. The squad is trying to sugarcoat the work of maintaining and improving stickwork skills and conditioning. The squad plays box lacrosse three nights a week in Boyden Gym.

Sports Briefs

With its collective eye toward the challenging spring schedule, the team gathers Mondays, Tuesdays, and Wednesdays at 9 p.m. two hours a night. Experienced new players are welcome to call coach Judy Dietel at 545–3815 to join in the fun.

Hoop it up

•The Schick three–on–three basketball tournament is in the midst of roaring action. With 33 teams kicking off the competition, seven teams remain: Three Percent, Bombers, Speak, The Rage, Riders, Hickman's Honeys and the Squids.

• Don't leave for Thanksgiving break without turning in your spring basketball teams. Rosters for spring basketball and spring ice hockey are due Nov. 19.

That New England weather...

Due to weather and field conditions, the soccer, softball, and flag football playoffs have been delayed. If all goes well, the final rounds will be played this week.

• The men's soccer final brings Delta Chi against Dellrium with The Vixen Women facing the Bushwackers in the woman's final.

• The Co–ed softball teams to play in the finals are the Beavers against the Porkadelics.

• As for flag football action, two evenings are needed to complete the season. The semi-finals consists of the Bomb Squad against Pike A in game one while Franchise meets Curly G. Cradle Rock in game two.

This week's sports briefs was compiled by Collegian staff member Chris Stamm.

All UMass club sports are invited to submit releases for Sports Briefs. Information is due each week on Wednesday by 12 p.m. Teams can either drop off information at the Collegian office at 113 Campus Center or fax us at 545–1592.

Flint, Calhoun to host U Game Clinic

After much anticipation, Minuteman hoop fans have finally gotten the hoop match up they've been waiting for.

Chris Stamm

On Dec. 27, the Massachusetts men's basketball team heads to the Springfield Civic Center for the inaugural U Game to face New England rival Connecticut.

UMass and UConn fans alike will have the opportunity to gain some insight on both programs before they square off against each other.

As a preface to the battle with the Huskies later in the month, coaches from both schools will host the first U Game Clinic on Dec. 1 from 12 p.m. to 2 p.m. in the Springfield Civic Center. Minuteman coach James "Bruiser" Flint and UConn coach Jim Calhoun will host a basketball clinic for the general public in which they will demonstrate drills and relate philosophies which have brought their respective programs to national prominence.

After the clinic, UMass and UConn fans alike will have the opportunity to ask questions and seek autographs from players and coaches from both teams. In addition, all fans in attendance will receive free admission to the Basketball Hall of Fame after the clinic.

For more information about the U Game Clinic, contact the University of Massachusetts Media Relations Office at (413) 545–2439 or Craigville Sports Associates at (401) 273–3211.

Dissection 101: Today, the men's AP poll

The AP preseason poll is out, here's a quick look at the top 15:

Casey Cane on College Basketball

No. 1 Cincinnati — As much as I hate to say it, Bob Huggins has got a good year comin' to him. Two names to throw at ya: Danny Fortson and Ruben Patterson. These two will be down right dominating in the frontcourt. Add to it a scrappy guard in Damon Flint and junior college transfer D'Juan Baker (is it me, or it now necessary to have someone with a D, De or an apostrophe in his name on every team?) and the Bearcats have the right ingredients to go far.

No. 2 Kansas — Many people thought that Kansas would be the preseason No. 1, then Jacque Vaughn got hurt. A talented floor general, Vaughn will be missed in the early part of the season due to his wrist injury, but the Jayhawks are by no means slouches with Vaughn gone. Paul Pierce, one of last year's most outstanding freshmen, Raef LaFrentz and Scot Pollard will have to carry the load in the frontcourt until Roy Williams' team is ready to play a full court game, a task they are ready to handle.

No. 3 Kentucky — They're not going to repeat. Get over it.

No. 4 Wake Forest — Tim Duncan returns (after bucking the going–hardship trend) and Wake is reaping the benefits. Duncan has the ability to lead this team to greatness, although it might be in conference form, rather than NCAA glory. Tony Rutland, on his feet after knee surgery, should be a force in the backcourt; and there's no harm in having Dave Odom sitting on their bench.

No. 5 UCLA — Jim Harrick is out, and the school is buzzing with the possibilities of recruiting violations, all this just after the Baron Davis–car incident. UCLA has the man– power in Cameron Dollar, Toby Bailey, Charles O'Bannon and Jelani McCoy, but the question is — are the Bruins hungry enough? Only time will tell.

No. 6 Utah — Keith Van Horn. Utah is ranked this high because of Van Horn, and the Utes were ranked this high last year because of Van Horn. But who cares? With a ranking this high, we get to see lots of Rick Majerus, and that's a good thing.

No. 7 Villanova — Freshman Tim Thomas has a long road ahead of him, but he may have what it takes to make the folks in Philly forget about Kerry, um... Kerry, oh yeah... Kerry Kittles. Team him with Chuck Kornegay and Jason Lawson and Villanova won't be bad.

No. 8 North Carolina — First of all — hasn't Serge Zwikker graduated yet?

Now, sorry, UNC fans, this just might be (read: will be) the curtain call for Antawn Jamison. After the numbers he put up last year (15.1 points per game, 9.7 rebounds per game), Jamison has got the word cha–ching

Cambodian militia group condemns U.S.

PHNOM PENH, Cambodia (AP) — Khmer Rouge guerrillas on yesterday condemned a U.S. Veteran's Day ceremony in Cambodia that honored 18 American servicemen lost in a failed rescue mission at the end of the Vietnam War.

A memorial plaque was unveiled Monday to pay tribute to the men killed in the botched May 1975 rescue attempt that came to be known as the "Mayaguez incident."

"Why, after two decades, does the U.S.A. continue to recall the stupid incident, considering they were invaders in Cambodia?" the guerrilla group said in a broadcast on its radio station.

The Americans were killed while trying to rescue the 39 crewmen of the Mayaguez, a U.S. container ship captured by the Khmer Rouge when it strayed into Cambodian waters.

Math error in Mass. insurance hikes prices

BOSTON (AP) — Massachusetts drivers will save $50 million on auto insurance next year and perhaps $150 million later because a mathematician discovered an error in the way rates have been calculated for five years.

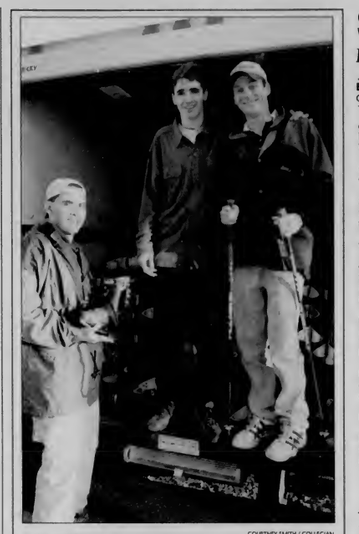
Motorists apparently have been the losers since 1992 because of the error.

Burt Feinberg, a mathematician with the State Rating Bureau, discovered the error after going over thousands of calculations used to determine rates.

"From a consumer's standpoint, it's not an understatement to say that Burt's a hero on this issue," Stephen D'Amato, director of the bureau, told The Boston Globe.

Officials said discovery of the error will mean a 2 percent reduction in 1997 auto insurance rates, approximately $50 million or a saving of about $15 to $20 for every policy holder.

A hearing on what to do with the estimated $150 million motorists have been overcharged since 1992 will be held next week before state Insurance Commissioner Linda Ruthardt.



Attorney General Scott Harshbarger wants the money returned to motorists in the form of rate reductions for the following three years.

Poetry event ends heritage week

Tonight, at 7 p.m. in the Graduate Lounge, Boricuas Unidos (BU) will host Una Noche De Poesia, the last of events scheduled for Puerto Rican Heritage Week.

This night of poetry will have some of today's most sought after poets including Willie Perdomo.

Perdomo is one of the new voices to emerge from the Nuyorican Poets Cafe in New York City. He has been called by some, the reincarnation of Langston Hughes residing in Spanish Harlem. Combining feelings of love and fear, rage and tenderness and verse in prose, Perdomo takes his experiences of city life and turns it into poetry.

Events this past week included a discussion on the roots of Puertorriquenos; a cultural fair featuring local arts, crafts and literature, two play presentations on the problems afflicting Puerto Ricans in the inner-city and a panel discussion on the political status of Puerto Rico.

BU was organized to address the needs and interests of the Puerto Rican community. BU's mission is "to support and advocate issues that will help improve the Puerto Rican community and to educate the entire community of the University of Massachusetts at Amherst and the Five College area on issues affecting the Puerto Rican community both on the mainland and on the island of Puerto Rico." — Lisa Chiu

Singer focuses on empowerment

Buffy Sainte–Marie thrills audience at Smith College concert

By Beth McCarthy
Collegian Staff

Acadamy Award winner Buffy Sainte–Marie, a University of Massachusetts alumna, gave an hour long performance last night at Smith College to celebrate the International Week of Action.

This week includes the Otelia Cromwell Day, honoring the first African American student to graduate Smith College.

"Amazing," said Meg Chilton, a first year student at Smith, of Sainte–Marie's performance. "It was acculmination of the week of bringing about multi–cultural awareness."

Sainte–Marie said that she wanted leave the audience with a message of "self empowerment."

"Self empowerment from their own uniqueness and their own point of view," said Sainte–Marie, who released her first album in 1964 by Vanguard Records. "It's discouraged because uniqueness is not welcome in the corporate system."

Sainte–Marie gave a performance of 18 songs in total, including two encores, many of which were the political protest songs that she had become known for such as "Universal Soldier," "Relocation Blues" and "Bury My Heart at Wounded Knee."

"She definitely had a native tone," said Big Bear, a Franklin county community member. "And many songs didn't. She showed the willingness of our culture to reach out and blend with other cultures."

Sainte–Marie later said that she "sometimes feels like a bridge of communication between many different people."

Sainte–Marie also sang two of what she called "simple love songs," and "Up Where We Belong" which she said she had written for the movie An Officer and a Gentleman in 1980.

"I loved her back in the 60's and I love her even more today," said Linda Pellitier, an ADA student at Smith College. "Maturity has done her well."

"Her songs brought tears to my eyes," said South Deerfield resident Bernice Cole.

Judy Schroth, also an ADA student at Smith, said that she still remembered her performance at Carnagie Hall in the 60's, as well as her presence at the original Woodstock.

Sainte–Marie said that she remembered the 60's also, but not as the press or the politiians will have it remembered.

"The 60's was a genuine student movement, not cooked up by men," said Sainte–Marie. "Originality was not only tolerated, but it was appreciated."

According to a UMass press release, Sainte–Marie received her bachelor degree from UMass in Asian philosophy in 1970, and an honorary doctor of fine arts degree in 1990.

Sainte–Marie stopped recording for 15 years, during which she raised her son — now 20 years old — and was a frequent cast member of "Sesame Street" for five years.

France later named Sainte–Marie Best International Artist in 1993, and she had also been asked by the United Nations to proclaim the International Year of Indigenous People during that same year.

Recently Sainte–Marie has earned the Award for Lifetime Musical Acheivement by the First Americans in the Arts. This award was named after her.

"The musician will figure out how to make music from a weapon," said Sainte–Marie referring to the music bow which is a single stringed instrument made from a bow which was used in her song "Cripple Creek."

Her presence at the Five College area, which will include a lecture titled "Up Where We Belong: Growing Beyond the Rat Race" today at 4 p.m. in Memorial Hall. The lecture and concert were put together with the collective efforts of the alumni relations office at UMass, the Josephine White Eagle Native American Cultural Center at UMass, and the Otelia Cromwell Day Committee at Smith College.

Annual ski sale arrives at SUB; Profits help plan Ski Club trips

By Adam Klein
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts Ski Club will be holding their annual ski sale today in the Student Union Ballroom from noon until 9 a.m. The sale will continue on Saturday and Sunday from 10 a.m.–9 p.m.

All new and used merchandise will be offered at 50 to 75 percent off retail prices. Included in the sale will be all major brands of skis and snow boards. They will also be selling in–line skates and an entire array of ski and snowboard apparel and accessories.

Arik Colbath, senior geology major and president of the UMass Ski Club, was very optimistic about the upcoming sale. He said "The deals will be great because the vendors will be battling each other for the lowest prices."

When asked about the range of equipment for sale, Colbath said, "You name it, we've got it."

Ski Club members were busily preparing for the three–day event late Thursday night as they filled the Student Union Ballroom with aisles and aisles of discount ski equipment. The money for the sale is borrowed from the SGA which the Ski Club always pays back in full and retains the rest as profit, which they use to sponsor many events for the upcoming season.

A free hourly raffle will be conducted all three days of the sale where prizes such as lift tickets for major resorts and ski apparel will be given away.

Several resorts will have representatives at the sale including Killington and Mt. Snow to inform shoppers of student discounts and package deals. The representatives will be there, primarily to cater to students needs, but will also answer any questions shoppers may have.

Also at the ski sale, Five College students and area residents will be able to join the ski club at one–time discount of $15. After the sale the price will go back up to $20. The membership allows members to participate in upcoming events at huge Ski Club discounts.

Membership is not limited to UMass students. The club boasts of having members from all five colleges and the community.

Some upcoming events include a trip to Quebec which will take place on Dec. 6–Dec. 8. The $125 fee includes transportation and two days lift and lodging. For those who are interested, deadline for sign–up is Dec. 2.

One Ski Club member who went on the trip last year said, "The nightlife and the skiing rock. You'll just have a great time."

Also coming up is the Ski Club's "Learn to Ski and Snowboard Weekend," which will take place at Mt. Snow on Dec. 18. The lesson pass and lift ticket is $25 and a full mountain pass is $30.

Army recruiter under investigation

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. (AP) — A U.S. Army recruiter has been relieved of duty during a military investigation into whether he raped a prospective female recruit, an Army spokesman said yesterday.

The recruiter was working at this city's Army recruiting office, where two other recruiters were reportedly transferred during a separate investigation of improprieties, including cheating on the entry examination.

Eric Hurwitz, a spokesman for the Army's Criminal Investigation Division in Ayer, said a 20–year–old prospective recruit from Westfield reported being raped by the recruiter in December in West Springfield. Asked if he was with her in an official capacity, the spokesman said, "It's still an open case, and this is being determined."

He said the rape was reported in April. If convicted of rape by a military court, the recruiter could face life in prison.

The Army currently is embroiled in a national scandal of sexual harassment. Army instructors at a training center in Maryland were charged with raping and harassing female recruits. At Fort Leonard Wood in Missouri, one male drill sergeant pleaded guilty to having sex with female soldiers and two others were charged with improperly touching female trainees.

The Army did not disclose the names of the accuser or the recruiter under investigation in the alleged West Springfield rape.

Linda Jeleniewski, public affairs officer at Fort Devens, could not say when the investigation will be completed.

Hurwitz said the criminal division did not contact police about the allegation. He said police could be notified later.

In the other investigation, Sgts. James Noel and Michael Hernandez were transferred from the Springfield recruiting station after the allegations of improper recruiting arose, Major Don Snow was quoted as saying by the Union–News in yesterday's editions.

The Army provided few details, saying the investigation into Hernandez' actions was incomplete.

But Capt. Timothy Murphy, lawyer for the 1st Recruiting Brigade and stationed at Fort Meade, Md., said part of the improper conduct involved entry tests in which Noel arranged to have others take entry tests for prospective recruits.

"There seems to have been multiple instances... of people improperly taking the test for others," Murphy said.

Fraternity celebrates black community with Homecoming semi-formal social

By Gregory Casimir
Collegian Staff

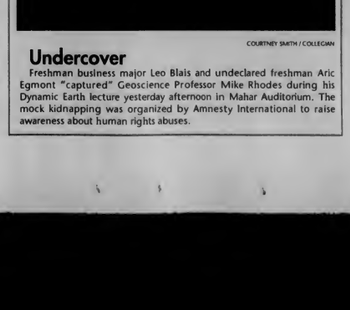
Sunday, Nov. 17, in the Campus Center Auditorium, the brothers of Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity, Inc. will hold an elaborate social event called "An Evening on the Nile" — a semi–formal culminating black Homecoming weekend.

The semi–formal is a celebration commemorating 90 years of excellence and achievement by the fraternity of Alpha Phi Alpha. The hallmark of the Alpha Phi Alpha is dedication to community service, and commitment to uplifting the black community. It is also a celebration of black culture and community achievement.

"In celebrating 90 years of excellence and achievement, we look forward to more decades of service and brotherhood because past achievement is essentially useless without a plan to continue in the future," said Kola Olosunde, president of Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity, Inc., on UMass.

The chairman of the event is senior and Alpha, Dan Lizana. Among some of the sponsors that helped make the event possible are the ALANA Caucus, Campus Center Activities, The Distinguished Visitors Program and the Haitian Student Alliance (HASA).

The evening will include a keynote address by Wilham Strickland, a catered dinner as well as a variety of entertainment. Expected is a live jazz band, courtesy of the Herman Hampton quartet, as well as a live performance by an undisclosed R&B group.



Some of UMass' own talent are scheduled to perform such as the Cape Verdean Student Alliance Dancers and Boundaries — an up and coming student–run dance troupe.

An award ceremony will be conducted lauding the achievements of blacks in the community, past and present.

Following the semi–formal, the brothers of Alpha Phi Alpha are throwing a hip–hop and reggae party.

Olosunde said that the event was for all students.

"Come and celebrate the spirit of Alpha, and enjoy the hospitality of Alpha Kappa Chapter," he said.

Butterfield to host benefit concert

By Jonathan Liberty
Collegian Staff

People's Market and Earthfoods will be sponsoring a benefit show for Jessie's House featuring the bands Bluespice, Kolaclan and Tricknee tonight at Butterfield from 8 p.m. to midnight.

"Being a non–profit student collective, a main goal of People's Market is to reach out to the community," said People's Market member Jane Odero.

Money and non–perishable food items collected at the show will be donated to Jessie's House, which is a homeless shelter for both individuals and families, located in Northampton.

According to People's Market staff member Graig O'Conner Jessie's House has been open for 16 years.

"Jessie's House gives a place for families to stay while receiving education and counseling services to help them to never become homeless again when they leave," O'Conner said.

O'Conner said that in recent years Jessie's House has received less money from the government and private donors, yet there are more requests to live there.

Odero said that the outreach committee of People's Market realized that Jessie's House was in need of help, which the market could provide.

Odero added that the committee felt it was best to collaborate with other student businesses, such as Earthfoods.

"This show fosters cooperation between the student businesses, while benefiting Jessie's House," said Earthfood's staff member Leah Fifield.

O'Conner said, "The benefit show will help connect students and the University to issues that go beyond the campus."

Campus Design and Copy (CD&C) donated fliers for the show. Greenough Snack Bar, Earthfood's and People's Market will be selling refreshments at the show.

The benefit show will also feature poet Omar Gayle.

"It is important for students to help the community because we are the community," said Gayle.

Admission cost is $2 or a non–perishable food item, which will be donated to Jessie's House.

"The show will be entertaining and serve a good purpose," said Odero.

GLB guild prepares for business fair

By Joseph Fountain
Collegian Staff

This weekend the Northampton Lesbian and Gay Business Guild will be sponsor a business fair and host entertainer Kate Clinton and lecturer Candace Gingrich.

The business fair is offering free workshops at the Hotel Northampton all day Sunday, starting at 10 a.m. and concluding at 4 p.m.

The workshops include "Creating a Career Plan" and "Marketing Basics, Small Business Marketing," at 10:15 a.m.

Those workshops will be followed up with "All You Can Be — Strategies for your Successful Business" and "Practical Retirement Planning for Lesbians and Gays" at 11:45 a.m.

Programs beginning at 12:45 p.m. will discuss "Home Ownership: Now and For the Millennium" and "Basic Estate Planning."

After lunch, participants can participate in "Adoption Brings Love Full Circle" and "A Funny Time to Be Gay."

The program on adoption will be presented by Marla Allison of Full Circle Adoptions and Family Planning and helps potential parents find those services.

Comedian Ed Karvoski will conduct "A Funny Time to Be Gay." The workshop traces the evolution of gay/lesbian stand up comedy through the '70s and '80s up to the comedy sitcoms of today.

Clinton is a well known lesbian comedian who has appeared on "The Arsenio Hall Show,""Good Morning America" and "Nightline." She will be doing her one woman show called "All Her Up!"

Clinton has been doing comedy for 15 years and is highly regarded in the GLB community.

Clinton pulls some of her jokes from the headlines in the newspapers. In a Metroline article, Clinton said, "I do a lot of political jokes, which are kind of hard to avoid these days... I try to do very topical stuff."

Clinton will be appearing at Sage Hall at Smith College in Northampton at 8 p.m. on Saturday, Nov. 16.

Gingrich, who is the sister of Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich (R–Georgia), will be speaking on her book Tales from the Campaign Trail. She will be appearing at the Northampton Hotel at 7 p.m.

Weld would accept Clinton job offer

By Glen Johnson
Associated Press

BOSTON — The White House may want to put a Republican in its next Cabinet, but it doesn't want an ideologue who would clash with President Clinton's more liberal social and economic views.

Enter William F. Weld, the Republican governor of Massachusetts. One week after losing his U.S. Senate race by a surprisingly large margin, the fiscally conservative, socially liberal Weld is openly touting his interest in serving in the Clinton administration.

"Oh, if Bill Clinton called me up and said, 'Would you like to be attorney general?' I would start Monday," the governor told an interviewer Wednesday.

While even Weld doubts that would happen, his interest has quickly evolved from casual to intense.

It also comes at a time when the White House is pondering what to do with Attorney General Janet Reno. There are reports the president wants to replace her but is afraid Republicans will charge she's being ousted for approving investigations into the administration.

Weld could resolve those concerns.

The two-term governor held the No. 3 job in the U.S. Justice Department under President Reagan. He resigned after two years in protest over the slow pace of an investigation into then-Attorney General Edwin Meese III.

He also prosecuted a number of white-collar criminals while U.S. attorney in Massachusetts in the early 1980s, which would insulate him from charges he'll be a softy when there are requests for independent counsels such as those Reno has approved.

As governor, Weld has also signed sweeping victim's rights and juvenile justice bills — two areas that have interested the president.

A former high-level White House aide said Weld's interest in a job is now widely known. It's more likely, however, that he'd be a candidate for a job in the State Department or as an agency head.

"The president's outreach to Republicans is a very genuine one, and I think he would receive that consideration," said the official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

Running the race fairly

Kaisar Khatak

Given a less than generous rate of economic growth, if it is no surprise to witness a recent white backlash against social programs like Affirmative Action. Should there be preferential treatment of minorities or a neutral decision process governing access to schools and jobs?

Whites and minorities both agree that a system of racial preference should be replaced with a system of meritocracy. A meritocracy is a system whose hierarchy rewards individuals by achievement. A meritocracy is considered democratic because it establishes equal opportunity. In theory, a meritocracy would be effective given an equal playing field (economically and politically).

However, given present economic hierarchy and the perpetuating white privilege that stemmed from past oppression of people of color, meritocracy proves itself a farce. In the race to accumulate wealth, not everyone starts from the same point. The playing field is not leveled for competition; white monopolization of resources creates an inevitable social hierarchy that keeps whites on top and people of color on bottom. If minorities are to improve their social status, they must find some way to gain access to those resources.

Historically, education was thought to be the equalizer. However, we now know that it may be the contributor. Education is perversely affected by economic variables. Unequal school funding, tracking systems and G.P.A. are all socio-economically linked. A higher G.P.A is strongly correlated with the characteristics and personality traits of the affluent. This comes as no surprise since schools were engineered by the capitalist class to reproduce the class structure. Clearly, the existence of uncontrollable external factors that determine educational success like socio- economic status prove a meritocracy cannot exist within our empirical world.

The 14th Amendment was passed to establish equality before the law. It established equal opportunity, not just for individuals, but for groups in society. Affirmative Action attempts to open doors and create opportunities for minorities where there were none. Successful minorities serve as role models reflecting opportunities and ideals for the next generation. However, in highly individualistic social culture, many tend to possess a narrow vision of public policy. This is why to many minorities, whites appear regressive.

Whites must comprehend that eliminating Affirmative Action will re-segregate society. Brown vs. Board of Education integrated American society by proving separate was inherently unequal. To eliminate Affirmative Action is to re-institute Plessy vs. Ferguson. At UMass, raising academic standards, which appears a non-political issue, will in fact have the inevitable effect of whitening the campus. What little diversity UMass possesses will soon become negated with the abolishment of Affirmative Action.

Economically, whites are not losing jobs because of Affirmative Action but because of corporate downsizing and outsourcing. Downsizing is responsible for one million jobs lost each year. Also, real wages for all workers, including white males, have been falling since the 1970s. Whites need to examine why the inequality gap between the rich and poor grows and why eliminating Affirmative Action will in fact have no net effect on their wages.

If whites still seek to eliminate Affirmative Action, they cannot do so without simultaneously establishing an equal playing field for minorities. Whites must redistribute the resources equally if the race is to be run fairly. If hierarchy is what whites seek and a meritocracy is the means, then redistribution is the only course of action. White reluctance to surrender economic privilege and create equal opportunity only demonstrates the discrepancy between ideology and reality and the distance between rhetoric and action.

Parenting, a right or a privilege?

Seema Gangatirkar

On a subway in New York City, a mother slapped her child. Hard. Once and then again.

The child erupted into tears. Everyone sitting in the vicinity looked away. After all, it was an altercation between a mother and her child. Did we have a right to interfere?

Then as we watched, the little girl tried to snuggle up to her mother, trying to seek some comfort. The mother turned away, pushed the child away.

Again, we watched in silence, trying to keep shocked expressions in check.

Ever since a mother slapped her child in a grocery store and then was put in jail for it, the debate has been raging over who has the right to raise children.

Colorado has gone so far as to insert a parental rights amendment in its constitution — rights that would give parents the ultimate control over their children.

Do parents deserve the unchecked right to raise children? Did this woman on the subway have a right to be a mother?

There are those who insist that parents must be the only ones who have the right to discipline and raise their children and that the state should not interfere.

Granted, there have been mistakes made when children have been removed from good, caring homes because their parents had been accused of child abuse.

But all too often, children have been abused and sometimes even murdered by their parents. In some well publicized cases, the child had originally been removed from the home and then returned because of one reason — biology.

The courts have decided in the past that biology is the overwhelming reason why children belong with the people who bore them and not for any other reason.

The biology argument came to the forefront with the Baby Jessica case, when the DeBoers and Schmidts squared off to see who would get the right to raise this child.

Not once did the courts ever consider who would make the better parent or what would be best for Jessica. Except in one instance, biology won in every round.

We ought to be thankful that in Jessica's case, she was desperately wanted by two sets of parents, neither of which were cruel or abusive.

Other children aren't so lucky.

There are times when the biology ought to be used as a viable reason to raise a child — when you, as a parent, have demonstrated your commitment and your love for a child.

Simply contributing egg and sperm does not make a parent.

The decision to have a child will change the rest of your life. It doesn't matter if you're 14 or 38, nothing will ever be the same.

For some, having children means having a little person around — someone who will love you unconditionally simply because you gave them life.

For others, having children is the ultimate prize in the game of life. The trophies that you can display and brag about at company dinners.

There are no right reasons to have children — there are only wrong reasons. While parenting cannot be completely selfless, it cannot be selfish.

Having children means that for the rest of your life, you're going to support them, love them, lead them. It means that now you have to think constantly of someone else and to care for them.

But when it comes to complete and total parental rights, there is no such thing. Having children is a privilege, not a right.

There should be free child care for all students with children who need it. Maybe if we cut the salaries of the Chancellor and all the Vice Chancellors we would be able to pay for it.

Lots of people have been complaining about the all the horse poop around campus. Lighten up, it's a lot better than all the poop that comes from the administration and the SGA!

I was just wondering why is it so difficult to get a date on this campus. I walked up to a woman with PETA and asked her if she'd go for a burger. She said no.

I have a great idea for the next great construction project here on campus. How about allocating some money for the purpose of covering up the Campus Center Hotel? A skirt or curtain would do. Let's put those tuition dollars to work.

According to a lot of news reports, voters chose Kerry over Weld because they thought Weld should continue to be Governor. Do you think Weld wishes he weren't governor? Or maybe he loves being governor and hopes that he can be governor forever? Well... there's the little issue about term limits.

Scene not treated correctly

To the editor:

As someone highly involved with the local hardcore music scene in general, I read Adam Dlugacz's column in the Collegian every Friday. I think that exposure of the hardcore scene is positive to scene growth, but I find Adam's negative attitude and closed-mindedness a detriment to the progression of the hardcore community.

Outside of a small handful of bands (H2O, Madball, Ignite, a few punk bands and various Long Island bands), Adam doesn't have many positive things to say about the scene, bands or people. Kind of ironic, it is generally a posi- youth movement. As someone who has the position of reflecting hardcore to the mainstream via print media, I think Adam has a certain responsibility, if he is indeed a member of the hardcore community, to promote all aspects of the scene and not slag the ones that do not appeal to him.

Adam's constant bashing of bands such as Earth Crisis and stereotyping straight-edge followers as seemingly mindless youth that only wear big clothes and over pierce themselves is nauseating and an example of the ignorance that continuines to split today's hardcore scene. I personally hold a great deal of seriousness in the way I choose to live my life and view Adam's insulting comments and assumptions as opposition to the very fascism I stand against every day. I wish to ask Adam if he has read any of Earth Crisis' lyrics since their "Firestorm" EP. Judging by his snide comments claiming that all they sing about is straight-edge and veganism, I would guess he hasn't. If he had, he would certainly notice that the lyrics for the last two albums have gone much farther than the realm of straight-edge and veganism. Many of their songs have spread out to such issues as battling sexism, racism and homophobia. Not to mention bringing to attention a high political awareness to environmental and ecological issues, government insubordination and third world crises.

Why doesn't Adam write about the atmosphere of a Madball show (notice I say atmosphere, not band) that encourages such societal ills as violence, sexism and homophobia? What about the blatantly sexist lyrics of some Ignite songs like "Past Our Means?" In his Nov. 1 article, Adam calls for people to "use hardcore to better yourself" and be themselves. Then why in the same article is he dictating to bands what kinds of songs to write? Why does he insist on categorizing and labelling bands? Whoever said Threadbare was an "emo" band anyway? When was the last time Adam went to a basement show? He certainly seems fond of commercial hardcore that frequents the local clubs as witnessed by his reviews. Is that hardcore?

I did not write to argue who is better, who is right or what band is better. This is not written to be a personal attack on Mr. Dlugacz, although I do question his motives and agenda. This is simply a request for Adam to be consistent and democratic in what he projects. I do believe this is possible without compromising his opinions. As one of today's strongest youth movements, hardcore does not need negative deconstruction, especially from within the scene. So come on Adam, "keep it real."

Racism is out there

To the editor:

This letter is in response to "In defense of the CC Store" by Elijah Goodwin (published in the 11/5 edition of the Collegian). In this letter to the editor, Elijah makes the claim that much of the negative attention the University Store has received has been "unsubstained and unfair." Obviously Elijah has been living in a hole somewhere, sheltered away from the harsh realities of this campus. The University Store, in particular, is one of the most criticized for its unfair treatment. Without a doubt the store provides services to the students and often times the specifics of these services are overlooked. But I would put money on the fact that in the store's constitution it says nothing about providing each student of color with a personal shadow/tour guide of the store each time we enter. In fact, when I tried to attain a copy of the constitution, the one that contains the questionable policies, I was repeatedly dodged by the store manager.

The targeting of students of color, I attribute directly to racism. Maybe it isn't blatant, "white only" racism, but the stereotypes that are bred from it seem to hurt as much. It has gotten to the point where, when I get into an elevator that already has a white woman inside, I'm just as disappointed to see her as she, perhaps, is to see me (Higher Learning). I do not care when Elijah says that the student security in the store are working hard despite a heavy workload to earn an extra buck. What I do care about is the student of color who has traditionally had it rough and is stopped by a student employee and falsely accused of stealing. As Elijah says, the student security is "rude, unfriendly and less than helpful," and when you mix a little racially motivated stereotyping to the brew you get something very intense that leads, at the very least, to false accusations of students of color.

Indeed, as Elijah says, making racial accusations in this liberal section of Massachusetts that we live in does hold a substantial amount of weight and we, as students of color, must be careful where we point our fingers. But at the same time, as a student of color, I know the racial animosities that are opposing me and how oppressive they can be. Because of this, I'm ready to condemn the first white person who crosses the street to avoid being on the same side as me. "The University Store is not full of raging, ignorant bigots," but the fact that the bigots in the store are not raging makes them all the more dangerous. I know that everyone has to do the job they were assigned to do, but when your job training tells you to look suspiciously upon an entire culture, chances are there is something wrong.

Students of color do not mean to throw a blanket of accusations over the entire store and all of its employees. However, you cannot dispute the fact that racism still exists and that yes, it exists in a variety of forms here all over our cozy, little campus — some residential areas more than others. This reply is not meant to jump down the throat of Elijah, but to simply "tell it like it is."

Come dancing; a guide to Noho's clubs

By Mike Burke
Collegian Staff

When was the last time you same a good club show in Amherst? Never, right? Besides the occasional on-campus event at the University of Massachusetts or Amherst College, live music doesn't penetrate the borders of Amherst too often. Well, maybe at the Mullins Center, but that barely counts.

So if you want live music on a regular basis you have two options: a) drive to Boston or, b) drive to Northampton. If you pick a) go buy a Boston Phoenix to aid in your club hopping — otherwise listen up because below is the juice on the Noho club scene.

First and foremost are the two stand-bys Pearl Street and the Iron Horse Music Hall. Nearly every night of the week these two fine establishments open their doors for the college-aged crowd.

Music fans probably are well acquainted with their intimate setting at the Iron Horse. After years of concert – going I still haven't found a venue I would rather watch my favorite acts. Listen to this combination: ace musical acts, state–of–the–art sound system, delicious food and high quality beer. You can't beat it.

Musically the club may be the most consistent and innovative around. So far this semester diverse acts like Dave Brubeck, Jimmie Dale Gilmore, Altan, Buffalo Tom, Cowboy Junkies and Joshua Redman have all graced the tiny stage to packed and appreciative audiences.

In the upcoming weeks and months prepare for an exciting line-up including Jimmy Scott, Amy Rigby, Toots & the Maytals, Maura O'Connell, Jim Carroll, Robyn Hitchcock, Marshall Crenshaw, Leon Redbone and more! For a cheap introduction to the Iron Horse cheek out the free Amy Rigby show Nov. 18 at 7 p.m. It's not too often the Horse opens its doors to everyone, so take advantage of this prime opportunity.

A couple blocks away stands the two-story club complex Pearl Street. Besides live music, this Northampton establishment is known for their heated up dance floors. Each night of the week the club hosts a different dance theme from International Night to Retro Night to Rave Night to Teen Night, there is something for anyone brave enough to wear a pair of dance shoes.

COURTESY DANNY CLINCH

The Mighty Mighty Bosstones are just one of many high caliber artists who are booked to play Pearl Street later this semester. Catch them on Nov. 22 and Nov. 23.

As for live music the club is not nearly as consistent as the Iron Horse but if you pick the right night you can catch all–star talent. The club is especially strong attracting ska and hard–core shows. Nearly every week the kids are waiting in line to skank or mosh the night away. This past Sunday, Spring Heeled Jack headlined a three band ska bill and punk's premier cartoon band Weston takes the stage on Nov. 21.

So far this semester the obvious big gig was Porno For Pyros but the club has also brought acts like Man...or Astroman?, Versus, Sebadoh, Madball, H20 and Bob Mould to its stages.

Highlights for the rest of the semester include the Mighty Mighty Bosstones from Nov. 23–24 and the Snow Show featuring the Lemonheads, Goldfinger, Superdrag and the Marshes.

After these two big clubs, the scene is largely made up of new faces and has beens. In the latter category is the Bay State Cabaret. Once the ideal local locale for underground rock, the venue has diminished into a club where area bands play for their friends and family. Long gone are the days when the tiny club attracted stand out up–and–coming acts. This club has become the ideal setting for the claustrophobic concertgoers who enjoy watching live music by themselves.

While offering up some live music, Club Metro serves up five nights of dancing a week ranging from the always popular Retro Night to Latin Night to Gay Night. In the Lava Lounge local bands play during the weekend and on Thursday.

If you want to hear live music without a club–like atmosphere walk on down to the Fire & Water Cafe, a delightful vegetarian cafe that offers up live music six nights a week at no cover. Sit back with a hot cup of coffee and a homemade brownie listening to area folk, jazz, or rock artists play for the love of music.

The cafe's intimate and peaceful settings provide a relief compared to the sweaty environs of Pearl Street upstairs or their plush atmosphere at some high–brow Iron Horse events.

With good food and no cover, Fire & Water should always provide a true alternative to the Northampton club scene.

While the Northampton still can't match Boston's club scene where there is never a dull night, but they don't have the Iron Horse. Compared to the rest of New England, Valley clubgoers have little grounds to complain.

Booking acts like the El Vez, the Mexican Elvis, Iron Horse has proved to have the most flexibility of any local club.

Dream comes true for mentally retarded Noho musician

By Jeff Donn
Associated Press

NORTHAMPTON — Robert Fisher can't read, write, talk on the phone, or even dress himself without help. He has been called many things: mentally retarded, brain damaged, paralyzed, showing autistic tendencies.

Now, for the first time, at Robert Fisher Productions, he is being called something else: boss.

"It's Rob's decisions that make it either 'yes' or 'no' on the major issues," said Cathy Taylor, a financial assistant at the 16-month-old Northampton company that runs benefit music concerts. Fisher is one of a very small but growing number of retarded adults living out their dream careers at the helm of their own commercial companies and projects — with state support. The Department of Mental Retardation says it supplies funding to perhaps a dozen such clients, including a jewelry maker who runs her own shop, artists who sell their own works and a radio announcer with his own program.

At first, it usually costs more. But costs can drop when the retarded entrepreneur's project begins making money.

"It's definitely still worth it," said Larry Tummino, assistant deputy commissioner of the department. "Over time, it's like an investment that you hope will come back to help. In the interim... Robbie's life has changed dramatically, and that's what we're here for."

Fisher, 23, of Amherst, suffered brain damage when he was born a month late. He has some paralysis of his right side and a seizure disorder, in addition to his mental retardation. Though his mother says it is difficult to test him rigorously for intelligence, she believes he understands virtually everything said to him.

His speech, though, consists largely of two- and three-word bursts that often sound childlike. At other times, he can crystallize a state of mind with the conciseness of a haiku poem. His mother, Edna McAveney, began noticing how he gravitated toward their home stereo when he was a toddler, apparently drawn by the music. At 9, he was given a harmonica and began playing by ear. He now plays guitar too and studies music with a private teacher. "People kept pushing us toward food service or horticulture, and I kept telling people music was what motivated him," said his mother. "Everybody has the right to have dreams, and most families who have disabled children don't have dreams."

It was she who came up with the idea of a music production company and finally prevailed upon counselors, administrators and bureaucrats to make it happen.

These days, Fisher spends about five and a half hours each weekday at his little office at Pioneer Developmental Services, a state contractor that runs other programs for retarded clients. A personal assistant, Sebastian Anderson, is paid through that agency's contract with the Department of Mental Retardation.

Anderson answers the telephone and performs much of the labor to organize and promote the concerts. But his most important job is to assess and carry out Fisher's wishes, consulting him on everything from types of musical offerings to the layout of advertising fliers.

"A lot of times I'll have to repeat the question four or five times," said Anderson. "It's a slow process."

Fisher's mother, a former social worker who now also works at Pioneer Developmental Services on other programs, keeps a close watch on her son. A board of directors makes sure that Fisher remains in control.

Like many executives, though, he is easily bored with paperwork. A musician with eclectic tastes, he thrills at appearing on stage and jamming with the performers.

"He absolutely has no stage fright, no fear. He is absolutely himself," said his mother.

Fisher also dreamed up the idea of running a dance at a nightclub near his office on the outskirts of this college town. He rents the space weekly, hires a DJ and acts as host.

Big Night: one of the many popular artsy films to pass through Northampton in recent months.

Noho's art houses: cinema at its best

From Bound to Trainspotting, Academy & Pleasant St. shine

By Adam Levine
Collegian Staff

Northampton is more than just your average New England town. Its streets are pouring with all facets of diversity and are filled with people from all walks of life. In order to adhere to such a vibrant culture, the town must reflect all sorts of artistic nature. The town's coffee shops and art galleries are thus essential to its needs of remaining a center for independent expression.

One of the most apparent aspects of Northampton's cultural awareness is its movie houses. Through this medium, Northampton is able to represent the best in foreign and independent film. This town is the farthest place in the country from traditional Hollywood cinema, and the quality therefore shows immensely.

What is so special about Northampton's theaters is that they are intently a refreshing breath from stale plotted mega– hit blockbusters. The films that grace Northampton's movie theaters replace boring action and humorless comedy with provocative and cutting edge stories. These are the sort of movies that one can leave the theater feeling truly satisfied with by their experience. You wont find a Rambo Part 4 playing anywhere in this town, rather movies that successfully portray film as a genuine art form.

Directors who make their films in an attempt to convey meaning as well as entertainment are the sort of filmmakers whose works you will find in Northampton. This is not to say that independent film is far too cerebral to enjoy. Many of the movies which have played in Northampton are as fun and exciting as those at the multi–plex, the difference is the innovation.

This season's Bound which played at the Academy of Music was filled with notable actors and a thrilling storyline. As a result of its subject matter and creative camera techniques, Bound could never play at your local mall. The truth of the matter is, that this particular film was far more exciting than any of the Die Hard Trilogy movies.

This does not mean that Hollywood can not produce quality films. On the contrary, normative filmmaking can be extremely innovative, but far to often the moviegoer is confronted with unoriginal material. Northampton specializes on giving the film buff a unique look at what the film world has to offer.

Perhaps one of this seasons most clever films, Big Night, was co–directed by Singles star, Cambell Scott. This is a prime example of a noted Hollywood celebrity reaching out to the independent world and creating far more worthy cinema.

Another example was director Jim Jarmusch's summer film, Dead Man. This brilliant western style adaptation of the poetry of William Blake starred heartthrub Johnny Depp. These are just two of the countless non–Hollywood films with successful directors and actors to have been displayed in the theaters of Northampton.

Northampton could not provide such exquisite portraits of the amazement of independent cinema without its very own theaters. Both Pleasant Street Theater and the Academy of Music strive to provide the town with such unique and imaginative films. Each theater is unique in its own way, opposed to your average multi–plex where if you have seen one, you have seen them all. It is essential for any movie fan next time in Northampton to stop by one of these theaters and see how brilliant they are.

Places to go & places to eat

Collegian staff recommends their Northampton favorites

Believe it or not, us Collegian folks don't spend all of our time stuck down in the Campus Center Basement. Below we have compiled some recommendations on things to do in Northampton.

Beth McCarthy (News Associate Editor)

My favorite thing to do in Northampton is shop. Well, its the only thing I've done in Northampton. Sad but true. I have not taken advantage of the quaint little coffee shops or the fantastic restaurants, I just don't see the point of travelling 40 minutes away if I'm not going to be spending a darn good sum of money.

Elizabeth Brown (Photo Editor)

Possibly one of the best things to do in Northampton would be to visit the Words and Picture Museum, in other words... a museum about comic books. The museum is four stories high and you work your way through it from the top down. It is really cool, plus they have a funland on the second floor where you can draw, read comics and watch comics on the TV... it's bitchin'!

Thang Vo (Photo Technician)

I love to go to the Haymarket and lose myself in hours and hours of reading, drawing, or staring at things.

Raghuram Vadarevu (News Associate Editor)

When I think of the best place to go in Northampton, I think of the Ammonouz Cafe and Main Street Records. It is a restaurant which serves Moroccan and other Middle Eastern dishes. Yo, I love the cous–cous! It is amazing! I also like the best record store to get New Order stuff at in the Valley, Main Street Records.

Bob Dunn (Columnist)

One great way to spend a Friday night is at the World War Two club. Where else can you shoot pool, use a periscope, pay just $1.75 for beer and get to hear 'Rockin' Bob' mumble his way through some of his favorite karaoke hits? I'll tell you... nowhere! Definitely worth a look.

P.S., Rockin' Bob is NOT me.

Daniel E. Levenson (Associate News Editor)

I have only been to Northampton twice. It is a nice place to visit, but I wouldn't want to live there because it is very far away from the University where I engage in my academic endeavors. The Iron Horse is pretty cool. If you take the bus there on a weekend night you will have to share your ride with about 2,000,000 drunk Five College students singing songs. That part is not fun. If you go, you should drive. It is not possible to take a submarine there because submarine rides are too expensive.

Alycia Hines (Business Manager)

The Country Cafe and Deli is by far the best place to eat in Northampton. There is such variety of salads, sandwiches, soups and AMAZING desserts. The atmosphere is casual and the people are funny. All this and it's even affordable for college students.

Pete Servais (Advertising Manager)

Pizzeria Paradiso is an all around good time. Their staff is friendly and they serve up some of the best pizza and beer in town.

Michael Elliott (News Editor and Librarian)

Heckling all the teenage skaters from the safety of a moving automobile to make myself feel big, tough and educated. I also enjoy going to Smith parties for beef stew and poker.

Lisa M. Oliveri (Arts & Living Associate Editor)

Northampton is a great place to just hang out with friends, but I often like to go to the Haymarket and just read. I've recently discovered lava Net and their great hazelnut cookies and huge cups of coffee. For dinner though, you won't find a better place than Spaghetti Freddy's.

Mark McGrath (Ed/Op Editor)

There's a special little bowling alley that's close to my heart in Northampton. It's Northampton Bowl on King St. Every weekend, they bring in a DJ for special nights. Disco Bowl and Galactic Bowl. If you happen to check the place out, you may never leave. The music is loud and the pins are flying. If you're lucky (or good) you could even make off with a prize.

Christina Poletto (Arts and Living Staff)

Pleasant Street Theater is one of the greatest things about Northampton. It is one of the few places that I know of in the Valley that allows for a interweaving of new, up and coming foreign and pop–culture films. With it's relaxed atmosphere and prime location (right down the way is a lovely little candy store with an amazing selection of gourmet jelly beans), what could possibly be better?

Jorma Kansanen (Sports, and Collegian hockey guru)

Well, I haven't tried it in a while, but I used to get into shows at Pearl Street for free all the time. You see, before my hockey guru days, I laid alms on the Arts and Living altar, reviewing shows for every band known to man. They were so used to seeing me at the door, they would wave me right through without checking the press list. Nice... but maybe I should not have mentioned that fact. Ugh.

Humphrey brown III (Black Affairs Editor)

I really have never spent any real time in Northampton to accurately say whether or not I like or dislike it. The first and only real time I was ever in Northampton was when I got on the wrong bus coming from the Hampshire Mall. From what I saw, it looked like an OK place. I guess. Like I said. I really couldn't tell you. I'm still trying to figure out what I really like about UMass.

Tara MK Connelly (Former Arts Junkie)

The Eastside Grill is a great place to eat — super key lime pie and clam chowder. Spolettos is also a nice place, it has an excellent menu and a lot of ambiance. I also like Thornes Market because they have a lot of stores where you can get more personal gifts for people or just window shop.

Mike Burke (Arts & Living Editor)
